The Senator from California headed his list with General Grant's name then and he stops with his name now. He has lopped his proposition immensely since the 15th of April. Let us see how he expanded its foliage on that occasion. These names followed the present contribution:

> Major-Generals John A. Dix of New York, George B. McClellan of New Jersey, NATHANIEL P. BANKS of Massachusetts—

A distinguished member of the other branch of Congress from Massachusetts. He was to be retired—

BENJAMIN F. BUTLER of Massachusetts—

Impossible task! He had undertaken to retire that distinguished gentleman. [Laughter.] He is even more difficult to retire than General Grant, according to the description of the Senator from Georgia; and yet the Senator from California, with a full head of steam on, went squarely at that distinguished soldier and civilian to retire him, [laughter]—

AMBROSE E. BURNSIDE of Rhode Island—

He was likewise to be retired on that occasion—

William S. Rosecranz of Ohio, Franz Sigel of Missouri—

And my excellent, brave, and gallant friend, formerly a member of this body—

John A. Logan of Illinois—

And then that peerless warrior from my own State—

Lewis Wallace of Indiana—

He was likewise to be retired—

Stephen A. Hurlburt of Illinois, W. B. Franklin of Pennsylvania, Henry W. Slocum of New York, Cadwallader C. Washburn of Wisconsin, Carl Schurz of Missouri—

I do not wonder at the Senator from California wanting to retire him. [Laughter.] I think I would vote to assist the Senator from California in that job. Retirement would improve him, on the principle that "distance lends enchantment to the view"—

Alfred Pleasanton of New York—

I believe he did retire some time ago; the last I heard of him was in connection with twenty-three miles of a little switchwater railroad out in my country. He was to be retired, however, by the Senator from California's proposition—

William F. Smith of New York, James B. Steedman of Ohio, Granville M. Dodge of Iowa, JACOB D. COX of Ohio—

What a retiring spirit had seized the Senator from California!

Mr. SARGENT. It shows how big the subject is; that is all.

Mr. VOORHEES. Further:

RICHARD J. OGLESBY of Illinois, JAMES A. GARFIELD of Ohio, Robert C. Schenck of Ohio, John C. Frémont of California, John A. McClernand of Illinois.

Those were the major-generals; and then the name of General Shields finds its humble place in this galaxy of stars:

Brigadier-Generals James Shields of Missouri, ALPHEUS S. WILLIAMS of Michigan, Charles Devens of Massachusetts—

Is he the Attorney-General?

Mr. COCKRELL and others. Yes.

Mr. VOORHEES. Ah, the one who was spoken of by Wendell Phillips in such affectionate terms! [Laughter.]

William W. Averill of New York, Clinton B. Fiske of Missouri, William Vandever of Iowa, Ralph P. Buckland of Ohio, John McNeil of Missouri, John M. Thayer of Nebraska, Halbert E. Paine of Wisconsin, THOMAS EWING of Ohio, Alexander Shaler of New York, Judson Kilpatrick of New Jersey, John M. Corse of Illinois, Edward M. McCook of Colorado, John F. Hartranft of Pennsylvania, Joshua L. Chamberlain of Maine, Joseph R. Hawley of Connecticut, and Edward F. Noyes of Ohio.

Now, if any Senator will rise in his place and say that after that kind of an amendment was offered to this bill on the 15th of April the Senator from California was not an object of suspicion so far as his good faith on this bill is concerned, I will agree that I have been wrong all the time. That is the most remarkable attempt at retiring everybody I ever saw. It was recognized in the Senate, by the press, and by the country as an open, bald attempt to smother General Shields; and I was surprised to-day when he offered his amendment to find that it began and ended with the first name of this immortal list. So we have had simply General Grant upon our hands. While I like General Grant as a military man, and I do not dislike him personally, for my relations to him were always kindly, still I felt as though there was mischief about it. I felt as if there were rifle-pits some place around. I felt as though this amendment came from one who wanted a short time ago to retire pretty much everybody on paper but really did not want to retire General James Shields.

So, Mr. President, if I voted against the amendment of the Senator from California with the belief in my heart that he had offered his amendment for the purpose of defeating this bill, this extraordinary document must be my excuse for thinking so. But I say now, as I commenced, that his word is satisfactory upon that subject. I think that it might be as well for him to keep stating that he is in good faith about it.

Mr. SARGENT. On this amendment.

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, on this amendment, not the other.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator will allow me to say the other was an argument against the bill in this: that it showed there were a large number of persons, perhaps some of them injudiciously selected, who had been wounded in the war or had rendered eminent services, some of whom the Senator speaks of himself with great respect.

Mr. VOORHEES. Of course I do of all of them.

Mr. SARGENT. It was to show the scope of the legislation. But if this bill is to go through, then I want to put on it, in perfect good faith, an amendment in favor of the greatest soldier in the Union.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then, according to the inflection of the Senator's voice just now in speaking of the good faith of this amendment, speaking of the amendment now pending, I infer I will commit no offense when I presume that he did not propose the other amendment in good faith.

Mr. SARGENT. Only as an argument against this bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from California makes most excellent speeches in this body; I always listen to him with pleasure; but I never knew his arguments to take just that form before; it was a most remarkable argument.

Now, Mr. President, a word or two more. I voted against the amendment retiring General Grant. At the same time, it is due to frankness to say that I am quite indifferent on the subject. I presume I shall vote again against it if another vote is taken, mainly to be consistent and because I do not think the measure is called for at this time; but whenever the proposition is brought forward, as it could have been in the last few years, by the Senator from California or anybody else, under circumstances which justify the belief that it is not used to destroy something else, I will give it very favorable consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Could not the Shields matter have been brought forward at any time within the last ten years?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes; I will come to that in a moment. I do not wish to detain the Senate; we have talked quite enough, I think, about this matter; but one word further. I know General Shields. I have met him during this session of Congress. General Shields is a proud man and does not parade his poverty, but there are men within the sound of my voice who know that he has pawned the sword his country gave him for his debts, and he is now utterly unfit in every way for any occupation, and is driven by necessity to travel over the country delivering lectures for the purpose of making a living at nearly seventy years of age.

Look at the picture on each hand: General Shields rendering the most brilliant services that a man can render, offering his life, as others offered theirs, it is true, but circumstances making his services perhaps more conspicuous than those of almost anybody else, shot to death as it was thought at Cerro Gordo, again shattered to pieces at Chapultepec, and fighting the battle of Chapultepec with his bleeding arm in a sling, as is depicted on the canvas on the stairway here and as is depicted on the pages of history. He was shot again in the last war. These wounds are upon him in his old age, infirm, and broken down, without property, without wealth, and without comfort. General Grant, on the other hand, is a rich man, unless the circumstances by which he is surrounded are fallacious. Poor people in these times do not travel with an escort like princes over the face of the earth; nor does he, except at heavy expense. I can only say upon that subject, as has been very eloquently and well said by the Senator from Georgia, that whenever a measure of this kind, or any other, is necessary to General Grant's comfort in the decline of his life, or at any other time, or for any other meritorious man, I shall not stand here to oppose it. I think in this case the wisest way would be to pass the bill as it came from the House and let it stand by itself. As to its being an unprecedented matter, as is alleged, I want to remind the Senator from Vermont that unless I was deceived by the sound he himself voted for the amendment placing General Grant on the retired list; so that so far as the principle of the thing is concerned he is as much concluded as we are. He voted to place General Grant from civil life on the retired list and we are voting to place General Shields from civil life on the retired list.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is greatly mistaken. I have not voted to place General Grant on the retired list.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator voted for the amendment placing him on the retired list.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought, differing with the Senator from Indiana, that, if there be a convenient season to put a civilian on the retired list, this is a good season to put General Grant on. My honorable friend from Indiana is always in favor of some other time.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then, the Senator from Vermont did vote to place General Grant on the retired list?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not. I voted to amend this bill, and gave notice that I should vote against the whole of it because I believe it to be a false principle; but, if the majority of the Senate believe it to be the right principle, then General Grant is the right man.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then, the Senator's motive was to amend the bill so as to make it objectionable and prevent its passage?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope it does not make it objectionable to the Senator, who is so much in favor of General Grant at some other time.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Vermont certainly voted for the amendment in order to embarrass the bill when he says that having amended it he will still vote against the bill.

Mr. KIRDWOOD. May I ask the Senator from Indiana a question?

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Why should attaching the name of General Grant to the bill defeat it?

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope it will not, I say frankly. If it is the wish of a majority of this body to attach General Grant's name to the bill, I hope it will not be defeated because it assumes that form. It will certainly not be by my vote. While I may vote against the amendment, yet if the bill be thus amended I shall certainly vote for the bill. Will the Senator from Iowa do the same?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. No, sir. I understood the Senator to say that the object of putting General Grant's name in it was to defeat the bill, in order to induce somebody to vote against the bill because his name was there. Now, why should that be?

Mr. VOORHEES. Was it the purpose of the Senator from Iowa to get somebody to vote against the bill because General Grant's name was placed upon it?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. My purpose was this: if the bill passed I thought that Grant's name would make it stronger, and that he was more entitled to consideration than Shields; but the Senator says if we put Grant's name to it, it must defeat the bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. I did not say so, and I will remind the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Vermont if they hope by putting General Grant's name in the bill thereby to compel me to vote against it, that I shall do no such thing.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, one single correction. The Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Indiana both state that the republicans (calling them by name) could have done this for General Grant at any time within the last several years. Why, sir, this is the very first year it could have been done at all. General Grant came out of the war at the head of the Army; he remained at the head of it until he was elected President. He was President eight years, and the day he retired from the Presidency the Senate assumed its present political complexion. You could not have passed a bill putting him on the retired list when he should go out of the Presidency, and send it to him to sign. But the Senator from Georgia says with an excess of generosity, which, of course, the country will appreciate, that whenever General Grant shall get poor, or infirm, or lame, or weak, or in want of something very badly, if he will apply, he will give him something. I like that! That is generous! He is going to wait until the man may possibly by the mutations of fortune be entirely reduced and then he is perfectly willing to give it to him, and he pledges that side of the Senate to give it to him! It would not be the first ex-President that was that way.

Mr. VOORHEES. I wish to say to the Senator from Maine that even in that case which he puts the Senator from Georgia would be a good deal more liberal toward General Grant than many Senators on the republican side of the Chamber are toward General Shields.

Mr. BLAINE. Ah!

> Thou canst not say I did it; never shake
> Thy gory locks at me.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will not.

Mr. BLAINE. I am a little more consistent than the Senator from Indiana. I am willing to vote for General Grant to go on the bill, and I am willing to vote for the bill when he is on, and I should think it a very extraordinary circumstance for the Senator from Indiana, after the speech he has made, if the question comes again before the Senate, to vote to exclude General Grant. If he does, I think he will turn a good many persons that have probably a warm side for General Shields against him. I mean merely as a measure of parliamentary tactics. Let me say to the Senator from Indiana, through the Chair, that it would not be good tactics, it might affect the bill in a certain way that the Senator would not desire.

There has been a good deal of pleasantry about retiring General Grant and about some persons here having an interest in retiring General Grant, and about General Grant not being ready to be retired. Giving him a position on the retired list of the Army of the United States is an honorable recognition by the Congress of the United States. It leaves General Grant to be disposed of by the people of the United States, and that will be very apt to be done without any regard to what the Senate may do on this side or the other. They have not generally asked the opinion of the Senate of the United States, if I recollect history, what was its view in regard to General Grant. They have generally taken that up and settled it for themselves, and I do not think it will be any very great block in the way of General Grant's popularity that the men whom he confronted in the great struggle for the Union and for liberty, with a solitary and honorable exception, breasted themselves against a recognition of his honor here. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator will yield, I wish to move an adjournment.

Mr. THURMAN. I have a very few words to say and I would rather say them now. I shall occupy but very little of the time of the Senate.

Mr. President, I voted against the amendment of the Senator from California; certainly not because General Grant is a republican; certainly not because I undervalue the military services of General Grant; certainly not because of any personal ill-will I have toward him, for I have no such ill-will. So far as my limited personal intercourse with General Grant is concerned it has always been exceedingly pleasant. I voted against that amendment upon principle and upon a principle to which I think no allusion has yet been made in this discussion.

To understand this, Mr. President, we must look at the principle that underlies our pension laws, and see how different it is from that which governs monarchical countries in the bestowment of bounties upon those who have distinguished themselves in their military service. Every monarch rewards his great military commanders according to his own sense of the services they have performed and the distinction they have acquired, and pays them out of the public purse; he heaps on them dignities and he heaps on them wealth. Napoleon made his great generals first marshals, then dukes, and princes, and one of them a king, and bestowed immense fortunes upon them out of the public treasury. England bestowed millions upon millions upon Marlborough, upon the Duke of Wellington, and upon others. But has that been the policy of this country? Has it ever been the policy of this country? Where has there been any great pension-list in this country of distinguished men giving them thousands and tens of thousands of dollars a year in order to support them during the remainder of their lives or to maintain a great dignity in either their social or their political or official life? Nothing of the kind has ever taken place. On the contrary, our idea has been that the people would reward by public position the men who had distinguished themselves in the military service of the country and that those who remained in the Army would be distinguished by promotion in the Army; and the principle, therefore, of our pension laws has been to pay the private soldier the pension. Our pension laws do not rest upon the idea that the man who is to be pensioned is the one who has displayed great ability, one who has rendered great services by virtue of a powerful intellect, but one who has risked his life in the service of the country and has been injured in his health by the accidents of war. That is the theory upon which our pension laws are founded, and in that respect they go much further than those of any country on the face of the earth; far beyond what any other government ever has bestowed upon its soldiery. We have pensioned almost all those who were in the line during the war of 1812, and their widows and their second widows too. I am told we have gone on until at last it was sufficient for a man to have been twelve or fourteen days in the war of 1812 doing anything toward the military service to entitle him to a pension. I do not complain of this at all. Since I have been in the Senate I believe I have voted for every one of such bills, and I expect to do so in the future, as the rest of you do; but I mention this to show that it is not the great services resulting from intellect, resulting from great military knowledge, resulting from great military skill, those services that it is the part of a great general to perform, that this Government has been accustomed to recognize by a pecuniary reward.

On the contrary, we heap honors on these men, if they are in the Army, by promotion; if they are out of the Army, by dignified and high positions in the civil service of the country. And thus it is that in respect to General Grant this country has bestowed upon him all the honors it could possibly bestow upon him. Twice has it made him President of the United States; it doubled the salary of that office in order that the pecuniary rewards of it might be the greater for him; the Presidency for eight years, its salary amounting to $300,000 in those eight years—all this it has willingly bestowed upon this distinguished general; and it will not do to say that republics are ungrateful, certainly not that the American Republic is ungrateful toward General Grant with this record before us.

Mr. President, I was a little surprised at one remark made by my friend from California, and which I think he himself will regret when he comes to consider it. In reply to some question that was put to him why this measure in behalf of General Grant had not been introduced long ago, he said it could not be adopted, as I understood him, long ago, but that now was the opportune moment. Why is now the opportune moment? Because it could be tacked to this bill.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator misunderstood me. I said now that Congress was considering the propriety of doing this thing, now was the opportunity.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly; I understood the Senator to say, and certainly, I think, it will be understood to mean—of course I am subject to his correction—that now was the opportunity. Why the opportunity now? Because certain Senators here and the House of Representatives, if I may allude to that, (as it has been alluded to out of order again and again,) by an almost unanimous vote, have said "Shields ought to be placed upon the retired list," now is the time to couple Grant and Shields and make a log-rolling bill and carry them both!

Why, Mr. President, I imagine that if General Grant is the high-spirited man his friends think he is, he would scorn to be carried through on a log-rolling bill. If he is to receive this recognition at the hands of the American Government, his own honor, the gracefulness of the thing too, requires that it should stand on its own merits and not be carried through Congress as a log-rolling measure. In my judgment, if I were disposed to vote for such a measure as this in favor of General Grant, I never would tie him to this bill in behalf of General Shields. Never in the world should it be said, if I were disposed to vote for this measure for General Grant: "General Grant, you have got this reward from the American Congress because you were tacked to the tail of the Shields kite, and that carried you through."

Mr. President, I am opposed to that proposition in respect to General Grant, as I say, upon principle, because I do not believe that it is wise for the Government of the United States to inaugurate that system of great pecuniary pensions to distinguished military men which obtains in monarchical countries. I do not believe it is right. We have a little civil pension list in this country. It is confined, however, entirely to judges of the Federal courts; and the only justification in the world for it, and the ground upon which it was put by the committee that introduced the bill and by those who spoke upon it, was that owing to the constitutional provision that a judge shall hold his office during good behavior, and therefore during life in almost every case, the only way in which you could get rid of an incompetent judge was to pension him off by allowing him to resign and continue his pay. It is a matter of history, as we all know, that we have had to resort to that to get rid of several judges who were totally disqualified to discharge their duties, one of whom was a lunatic, absolutely insane, and others totally disqualified to discharge their duties. The provision of the Constitution in regard to the tenure of the judges compelled us to make a civil pension-list as to the Federal judiciary; but we never have gone one single step beyond that. And in respect to the military and naval pension list—and I include both under the term "military"—we never have gone on the monarchical principle of giving great pensions to the distinguished officers in our service, but have rather given some recognition to the private soldier or the private seaman who has risked his life and incurred loss of limb or member or health in the public service.

Mr. President, even with that limitation, our pension list amounts, if I am not mistaken, to about thirty million dollars a year; far more than carried on all the functions of the Government of the United States when I arrived at man's estate; far more than paid all our expenses, pensions included, and interest on the public debt included, when I arrived at man's estate. If we are to add to this a great list of pensions commensurate with our idea of the intellectual ability and intellectual services and military skill of the generals and admirals and the like who have figured in our service, then we shall have that state of affairs which exists in monarchical countries and which never yet has been adopted here.

Mr. President, when I have made these remarks, I should not find fault with anybody for saying to me "this necessarily compels you to vote against the bill as it came from the House, because every principle which you have advanced militates against that bill." I feel the full force of that objection, and I must say that, highly as I esteem General Shields personally, for I had the pleasure of knowing him many years ago, much as I value the services which he has rendered to the country, much as I believe he is deserving of the country, it is not without misgivings that I shall cast a vote for the bill as it came from the House, if it shall in that shape be presented. I shall do so, however, entirely on the ground stated by the Senator from Georgia so well, and by the Senator from Indiana, that the case is wholly exceptional. Here is a man nearly or quite seventy years of age desperately wounded, wounded in the Mexican war, badly wounded in the civil war, in very humble if not absolutely destitute circumstances, and who might be selected as the bravest grenadier of France, well worthy of our esteem and needing some provision for his declining old age.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator why a pension bill for him does not answer that purpose?

Mr. THURMAN. I would greatly prefer that if the pension was made adequate to the purpose.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I will sustain the Senator from Ohio there.

Mr. THURMAN. I would prefer that on principle. I would set no bad precedent then, and I should not do the injustice to officers of the Army to which the Senator from Vermont referred. I should greatly prefer that the bill was in that shape, but I have not the shaping of the bill at all. I must take what comes to me, and although I have so high an estimation of the merits of this gentleman and I feel the force of the peculiar circumstances of the case so strongly that I shall vote for the bill if it stands single and alone as it came from the House, yet I do it with very great doubt whether I am not helping to set a precedent which ought not to be set.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President——

Mr. HAMLIN. With the consent of the Senator from New York, the hour being late, I submit a motion to adjourn.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope not. Let us finish this bill.

ALLEGED FRAUDS IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. At the request of the Speaker, the Chair desires to announce the following select committee on alleged frauds in the late presidential election:

Mr. CLARKSON N. POTTER of New York, Mr. WILLIAM R. MORRISON of Illinois, Mr. EPPA HUNTON of Virginia, Mr. WILLIAM S. STENGER of Pennsylvania, Mr. JOHN A. MCMAHON of Ohio, Mr. THOMAS R. COBB of Indiana, Mr. JOSEPH C. S. BLACKBURN of Kentucky, Mr. JACOB D. COX of Ohio, Mr. BENJAMIN F. BUTLER of Massachusetts, Mr. THOMAS B. REED of Maine, and Mr. FRANK HISCOCK of New York.

Mr. GARFIELD. As the name of Governor Noyes was mentioned in the resolution appointing the committee just announced, I ask leave to have referred to that committee a cable dispatch which I have received from him this morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the dispatch will be referred to the committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Cable message, received at Washington, May 20, 1878.]

To JAMES A. GARFIELD, Washington, D. C.:

When investigating committee is organized have me subpœnaed.
PARIS. NOYES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the reference will be made as requested.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no doubt the committee will do Governor Noyes the justice to have him subpœnaed.

COMMITTEE ON TENTH CENSUS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires also to announce on the joint select committee on the tenth census the name of Mr. ALVAH A. CLARK, of New Jersey, in place of Mr. WILLIAM S. STENGER, of Pennsylvania, resigned.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the Army appropriation bill until two o'clock when, under the rules of the House, the Committee for the District of Columbia will be entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that on Monday this can only be done by a suspension of the rules by a two-third vote.

Mr. ATKINS. I am aware of that.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of order. I understand the Speaker has a list of gentlemen to be recognized for motions to suspend the rules on Monday. I make the point of order that those gentlemen should be recognized in regular order.

Mr. FRANKLIN. That does not prevent the Chair from recognizing the gentleman from Tennessee to move to suspend the rules to proceed with the consideration of an appropriation bill.

Mr. ATKINS. It is competent, I suppose, for the House to decide what business it will entertain.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] that it has been customary for the Speaker to recognize motions in favor of appropriation bills in preference to others; otherwise the Chair would recognize the gentlemen in order on the list presented to him by the Speaker's clerk. The Chair understands that the Speaker always gives preference to a motion from an appropriation committee in regard to a general appropriation bill. The Chair therefore recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee, but with the understanding that it will require a two-third vote on the part of the House for the House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PAGE. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. ATKINS. I have declined the requests of several friends on this side to yield to them and I cannot yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I call for the regular order.

The question being taken, the rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the motion of Mr. ATKINS was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.)

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole until two o'clock for the purpose of proceeding with the bill (H. R. No. 4867) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes. The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. KIMMEL.]

Mr. KIMMEL. Mr. Chairman, I trust I am properly impressed with the importance of the subject of which I am about to speak. I believe I approach it without partisan bias. I have the deepest conviction that upon a proper adjustment of it depends the peace and, I fear, the liberties of the people. I confess that the more deeply I inquire into the steady growth of the standing Army and the uses to which it has been applied, the stronger my conviction becomes that the highest patriotism demands the wisest precautionary measures.

Reviewing the past and attentively considering the present, I conclude that this is a time most auspicious for considering such measures.

The cause which selfish politicians so sedulously used as a means for cultivating sectional hate has ceased to exist. The statesmen whose skill was inadequate to the demands of the situation which those politicians had created have passed or are passing away. The people demand repose. Party pride finds but little inspiration from the qualities of its respective leaders, so that the good men of both the great parties may and do mingle in friendly counsel. Soldiers who crossed their swords in deadly conflict now interchange friendly greetings, and widows and orphans bedeck with flowers and bedew with tears the graves of those by whose hands their husbands and fathers fell. It seems as though the past is to be remembered only for its glories and the lessons to be learned from its teachings. This condition seems to assure that calm consideration by which statesmanship triumphs over the arts of the demagogue and the violence of the partisan.

THE DREAD OF STANDING ARMIES—COLONIAL TIMES.

Let us see by the broad light of history how fatal standing armies have been to liberty, and profiting by these examples learn how well these justify the distrust of the fathers. This dark cloud cast its shadow across their path and seems to have been their constant dread. Many of them were learned men, most of them wise men, patriots all. The records of their statesmanship show that they sought and found light in the experience of every government that preceded the one they were ushering into existence. They found—

That even Tacitus, the friend and servant of Roman emperors in the worst period of Roman history, when the pretorian guard sold and resold the Roman crown exclaimed, "Is there any escape from a standing army but in a well-disciplined militia?"

That in all the States of Western Europe, the shattered fragments of the Roman Republic, after the lapse of many centuries there remain recognizable vestiges of Roman freedom. Aragon was freer than England; Castile as free; the governments of the north almost patriarchal, and that even in France the king was far from absolute. That in all these there were restraints on the prerogative of the crown in fundamental laws and representative assemblies, and that by the force of standing armies all these constitutions, except that of England, had been crushed before the convention of 1787 had formed the Constitution of the United States.

That the history of England, their mother country, with which they were so loath to part, teemed with accounts of stern resistance to standing armies.

That Lord Bacon, the wisest although the meanest of mankind, had the courage in the time of the tyrant Tudors to declare that a "mercenary army is fittest to invade a country but a militia to defend it."

That the attempt to create a standing army under Charles I cost Strafford his head and eventually cost Charles himself, first his throne and then his life.

That General Monk, a republican general, with six thousand men, the remnant of Cromwell's republican army, overthrew the commonwealth of England by restoring Charles II to the throne.

That during the reign of this same Charles II this feeling of the English people found expression in the action of a grand jury which presented the standing army, and the pension Parliament, as it was called, voted that army a nuisance, and sent a member to the tower for saying "the king might keep guards for the defense of his person."

That when William of Orange desired to import into England the continental system, the consent of Parliament to the establishment of a standing army was obtained only by the passage of the mutiny act, which limited its existence to a single year.

That in the short period of one hundred years from the date of its establishment this army had increased to eighteen thousand men, and that part of that army was being employed for the subjugation of the colonies, so that in the immortal Declaration of Independence, when summing up the wrongs of years, they charged that "He (the king) has kept among us in times of peace standing armies without the consent of our Legislatures."

DREAD OF STANDING ARMIES DURING THE REVOLUTION, 1776 TO 1789.

This dread and detestation of standing armies appears on every page of their progress toward independence and the establishment of the Constitution of 1789.

On this subject the constitutions of the several States used emphatic language. The constitutions of Pennsylvania, North Carolina, and Vermont declared that "as standing armies in times of peace are dangerous to liberty, they ought not to be kept up." The constitutions of Virginia, Delaware, and Maryland declared that "standing armies are dangerous to liberty." New Hampshire declared that "standing armies are dangerous to liberty." Massachusetts declared that "as in times of peace armies are dangerous to liberty they ought not to be maintained."

Several of the States objected to the Articles of Confederation of 1776 because those articles did not deny the power of the confederation to maintain a standing army. In the debates in the conventions which adopted the Constitution of 1787 the spirit of resistance to standing armies is ever present.

Patrick Henry, the soul of the Revolution, in expressing his utter detestation of standing armies, said, as with prophetic eye he foresaw the future, "A standing army we shall also have to execute the execrable demands of tyranny. And how," he asked, "are you to punish them? Will you order them to be punished? Who will execute your commands? Will your mace-bearer be a match for a disciplined regiment?" (See Virginia Debates, 1787, page 66.)

I abominate and detest a government where there is a standing army. * * * When once a standing army is established in any country the people lose their liberty.

Page 287, Mr. Madison, the Father of the Constitution, said:

Page 446, Mr. Grason said:

We ought, therefore, strictly to guard against the establishment of a standing army—whose only occupation would be idleness, whose only effort would be the introduction of vice and dissipation, and who would at some future day deprive us of our liberties as a reward for past favors by the introduction of some military despot.

In the Federalist where Mr. Madison, the Father of the Constitution, and Mr. Alexander Hamilton, the great advocate of its aristocratic and centralization features, in carefully prepared essays advocated its adoption, are to be found the truest expositions of its meaning.

On page 174, Mr. Madison wrote:

Not less true is it that the liberties of Rome proved the final victim of her military triumphs, and that the liberties of Europe, as far as they ever existed, have with few exceptions been the price of her military establishments. A standing force is therefore a dangerous at the same time it may be a necessary provision. On the smallest scale it has its inconvenience. On an extended scale its consequences may be fatal. On any scale it is an object of laudable circumspection and precaution.

Standing armies, it is said, are not provided against in the Constitution, and it is therefore inferred that they will exist under it. This inference, from the very nature of the proposition, is at best but problematical and uncertain.

This record attests the deep detestation the fathers felt for a standing army; that if provided for at all by the Constitution it was only in the last resort. That they could have contemplated such a peace establishment as this Government now maintains I cannot believe any honest man will aver.

It was intended by the fathers that the militia should be a substitute for a standing army. (Elliott's Virginia Debates, 1785 to 1789.)

Page 285, Mr. Madison, the Father of the Constitution, said:

If insurrections should arise or invasion take place, the people ought unquestionably to be employed to suppress and repel them rather than a standing army. The best way to do these things was to put the militia on a good and sure footing and enable the Government to make use of their services when necessary.

Page 287, Mr. Madison said:

The most effective way to guard against a standing army is to render it unnecessary. The most effective way to render it unnecessary is to give the Government the power to call out the militia.

Page 309, Mr. Madison also said:

The Constitution does not say a standing army should be called out to execute the laws. * * * The militia ought to be called out to suppress smugglers. Will this be denied? If riot should happen, the militia are proper to quell it to prevent resort to another mode.

Page 286, Mr. Mason said:

If they, the Government, ever attempt to harass and abuse the militia they may easily abolish them and raise a standing army in their stead. There are various ways of destroying the militia. A standing army may be perpetually established in their stead. Should the General Government wish to render the militia useless, they may neglect them and let them perish, in order to have a pretense for establishing a standing army.

In the Federalist, page 121, Mr. Hamilton wrote:

The attention of the Government ought particularly to be directed to the formation of a select corps of militia of moderate size, upon such principles as would fit it for service in time of need. * * * This appears to me the only substitute for a standing army, and the best possible security against it, if it should exist.

How plainly the purpose is expressed by these, the fathers of the Constitution. The militia to be a substitute for a standing army. The militia was to be called out to execute the laws, to suppress smugglers and insurrection, to quell riot and repel invasion. Does any man question this interpretation of the instrument these, its architects, framed?

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE MILITIA.

Every State shall always keep up a well regulated and disciplined militia.—Articles of Confederation, 1776, article 6.

The militia of this country must be considered the palladium of its liberties.—Washington's Circular Letter to Governors, 1783.

A well-regulated militia being necessary to a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.—Constitution, 1789, amendment 2.

AFTER THE ADOPTION OF THE CONSTITUTION, 1789.

President Washington, in his message, June, 1789, urged the necessity of organizing the militia in these words:

It is unnecessary to offer arguments in recommendation of a measure on which the honor, safety, and well-being of our country so evidently and so essentially depend.

January 8, 1790, he said to Congress:

A free people ought not only to be armed, but disciplined, to which end a uniform and well digested plan is necessary.

January 18, 1790, General Knox, then Secretary of War, in his famous plan transmitted to Congress, said:

The idea is therefore submitted whether an efficient military branch of Government can be invented with safety to the great principles of liberty, unless the same shall be formed of the people themselves, and supported by their habits and manners. * * * An energetic national militia is to be regarded as the capital security of a free republic; and not a standing army, forming a distinct class in the community.

December 8, 1790, President Washington again pressed on Congress the importance of the militia.

October 25, 1791, he said to Congress:

The first (the militia) is certainly a subject of primary importance, whether viewed in reference to the national security, to the satisfaction of the community, or to the preservation of order.

May, 1797, President Adams urged upon Congress a revision of the laws organizing the militia "to render that natural and safe defense of the country efficacious."

CONGRESS AND THE MILITIA—NEGLECT OF THE MILITIA PREDICTED—1790 to 1803.

In the debate on the second amendment to the Constitution Mr. Gerry, of Massachusetts, used this language:

What, sir, is the use of the militia? Is it to prevent the establishment of a standing army, the bane of liberty? * * * Whenever governments mean to invade the rights and liberties of the people, they always attempt to destroy the militia in order to raise an army upon their ruins. This was actually done by Britain at the commencement of the Revolution. They used every means in their power to prevent the establishment of an effective militia at the eastward. The Assembly of Massachusetts, seeing the progress that the administration were making to divest them of their inherent privileges, endeavored to counteract them by organizing the militia; but they were always defeated by the influence of the Crown.—Annals of Congress, 1789–1791, First Congress, page 778.

Mr. Jackson said:

The Swiss Cantons owed their emancipation to the militia establishment, the English cities rendered themselves formidable to the barons by putting arms in the hands of the militia, and when the militia united with the barons they extorted the Magna Charta from King John. * * * In England the militia has of late been neglected and the consequence is a standing army. In a republic every man ought to be a soldier and prepared to resist tyranny and usurpation as well as invasion, to prevent the greatest of all evils, a standing army.—Ib.

Mr. Burke said:

He knew it was the policy of the day to make the militia odious.—Ib., volume 11, page 1869.

THE MILITIA ORGANIZED AND CALLED OUT IN VIEW OF INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

Congress passed an act to provide for the national defense by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States; a very elaborate and carefully detailed act, the foundation of our present militia system, to which but little has been added. (See Annals of Congress, 1791–1793, Second Congress, vol. 1, page 1392.)

Congress passed an act authorizing the President "to require the executives of the several States to take effectual measures, as soon as may be, to organize, arm, and equip according to law, and hold in readiness to march at a moment's warning, the following proportions, respectively, of eighty thousand men," in view of Indian hostilities. (See Annals of Congress, 1793–1795, Third Congress, vol. 1, page 1446.)

Each Congress exercised this power for this same purpose. (See Annals of Congress, 1795 to 1803.)

Thus it is evident that during this period, when there existed the most extensive Indian invasion, actual and threatened, the country had ever known, the militia was relied on for defense, the regular Army at no time exceeding 3,578 officers and men, and often not two thousand.

OPPOSITION IN CONGRESS TO A STANDING ARMY.

The dread of a standing army so distinctly and constantly apparent throughout the history of the colonies and the confederation, from 1775 to 1789, was not allayed by the adoption of the Constitution. The establishment of an army, however small, met with constant and determined opposition. The purpose for which the small army of the earlier period was raised is always most carefully set forth. (Annals of Congress and American State Papers.)

August 10, 1789, six months after his inauguration, President Washington, in his message to the Senate, said:

I have directed a statement of the troops in the service of the United States to be laid before you for your information. These troops were raised by virtue of the resolves of Congress of October 10, 1786, and October 3, 1787, in order to protect the frontiers from the depredations of hostile Indians.—1 American State Papers, page 5.

This Army consisted of 840 men.

Congress passed an act regulating the military establishment of the United States, approved April 30, 1790, section 1 of which act raised the Army to 1,216 non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, and section 15 reads:

For the purpose of aiding the troops now in service, or to be raised by this act, in protecting the inhabitants of the frontiers of the United States.—Annals of Congress, 1789–1791, First Congress, volume 11, pages 2282 and 2283.

Congress passed an act for raising and adding another regiment to the military establishment of the United States and for making further provision for the protection of the frontier, of which act section 1 enacts that there shall be raised an additional regiment of infantry, which, exclusive of commissioned officers, shall consist of 912 non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians. (See Annals of Congress, 1789–1791, First Congress, volume 2, page 2415.)

According to the American State Papers, 1807, volume 1, page 223, the total force of the Army was 2,418. By the same authority, 1810, volume 1, page 251, the total force of the Army was 4,189.

On the motion to strike out the second section of the bill, which contemplated the raising of four additional regiments, the debates exhibit vigorous opposition. (See Annals of Congress: Protection of the frontiers, 1792, Second Congress, page 337.)

Page 673, Mr. Steel, of North Carolina, said:

He was certain neither the secretary nor any other person could account rationally for the occasion of such establishment; * * * neither was it contemplated in the Constitution of the United States. Yet it has, in the short space of three or four years, been imposing on the country burdens which the people have at length expressed their abhorrence of. It has been increased from $137,000 in 1789 to the extravagant demand now required of $1,171,719, and $50,000 contingencies for the support of 1793.

Page 765, Mr. Parker said:

He always abhorred the idea of keeping up standing armies in this country.

Mr. Giles objected to the retention of a major-general, (Anthony Wayne,) saying:

It would be the commencement of sinecures in the military department.—Annals of Congress, 1796, Fourth Congress, first session, page 1420.

In 1795 Mr. Madison moved an amendment to the act for raising a legion:

That these troops should be employed only for the protection of the frontier.

Mr. Randolph said:

The most popular act would be to put down the Army of the United States and arm the militia.—Annals of Congress, 1809, Eleventh Congress, part 1, page 61.

Mr. Potter, (Rhode Island,) speaking of the Army, said:

Give them power and they will generally go to the extent of it, if not abuse it.—Annals of Congress, 1810, Eleventh Congress, part 2, page 1590.

Thus, sir, it will be seen the dread of this Army found expression in Congress as late as 1810. After this period either the supineness of the people or their confidence in their strength seems to have made them indifferent to its existence. Later events demonstrate how rational was the dread of the fathers, and admonish us that "the price of liberty is eternal vigilance."

THE STANDING ARMY—ITS ORIGIN, GROWTH, AND STRENGTH AT PERIODS STATED—AND THE SUBSTITUTION OF THE ARMY FOR THE MILITIA.

Now, sir, I propose to exhibit the origin, growth, and strength of the standing Army and the gradual substitution of the Army for the militia despite the dread, detestation, and warning of the fathers:

[From the Annals of Congress.]

1789.—The Army of the United States consisted of 840 men, cost $137,000.
1790.—The Army was increased to 1,216 men, &c.
1791.—One regiment was added, 912 men, &c. Cost $1,171,719.
1794.—One regiment of artillerists and engineers was added, 992 men, &c.
1794.—Total army, 3,120 men, &c.
1795.—All former acts repealed and an act passed to increase the Army to 5,793 of all arms.
1796.—An act reorganized the Army so that it consisted of 3,620 men of all arms.
1798.—An act added 744 men, &c., making total strength 4,364 men, &c.
1800.—An act authorizing the President to reduce the Army.
The above was the authorized strength of the Army at the period stated.

[From the American State Papers.]

Page 48.—From 1802 to 1808, inclusive, the average strength of the Army was 2,726 men and non-commissioned officers.
The average cost of the Army for the same period was $798,194.98.
The cost per man, including officers, was, $292.80½.

Average cost of the Army for the same period was $2,301,621.48.
Annual expense per man, including officers, was $383.60.

[From Reports of the Secretary of War.]

1877.—Annual cost per man, including officers, $1,263.80.

MILITIA INTENDED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR A STANDING ARMY—HOW IT HAS DECAYED FROM NEGLECT.

We have seen, sir, how great was the hope of the fathers that militia, "the natural defense of a free state," would save the country from the dangers of a standing army, "the bane of liberty." And we have seen how baseless was their hope; how, as a peace establishment, it was destroyed by neglect within twenty years after the adoption of the Constitution, so far at least as a national institution; how all the influence of Washington could not arouse the people to sustain "this palladium of their liberty;" how the well-digested plan of General Knox, Washington's able Secretary, failed in peace though effective in war. We have seen, sir, how Congress has chosen to forget the existence of the militia, so that the law remains to-day as it was enacted in 1792. The law provides now, as it provided then, that the militiaman, officer and private, shall supply all things necessary to the service, his horse and accouterments; the officer shall have now, as in 1792, "a hanger and a spontoon," and the private shall have a "firelock and two spare flints," and for the reimbursement to the militiaman for the expense of this outlay Congress appropriates now, as in 1808, the sum of $200,000 each year—about two and a half cents apiece for each militiaman, officer and man, in the United States of America, for discipline assembled; most certainly not a very extravagant allowance. Two hundred thousand dollars a year for the militia; $31,597,270 a year for a standing army. Two and a half cents a year for a militiaman, "the natural defense of a free state;" $1,263 a year for a regular soldier, "the bane of liberty." Sir, I will not weaken this statement by a word of comment.

STANDING ARMY NOT TO BE EMPLOYED FOR THE ENFORCEMENT OF THE LAWS.

Throughout the entire discussion of the standing army, it is clear that the American spirit would not tolerate the possibility of employing that army for the execution of the laws. The opinion of the times was distinctly and unanimously against it. This opinion is embodied in the Constitution. It is evident in the grouping of the powers conferred on Congress. The war power is given in article 1, section 8, in clauses numbered 11, 12, 13 and 14. These are:

11. To declare war, grant letters of marque and make rules concerning captures on land and water;
12. To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years;
13. To provide and maintain a Navy; and
14. To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

This is too plain for argument. In these four clauses is conferred the power to declare war and the power to obtain the means for carrying on the war. Then another power is given, separate and distinct from the war power. The power to execute the laws, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions is given in clauses 15 and 16. These are:

15. To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions;
16. To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline, prescribed by Congress.

In these two clauses is conferred the power to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and the means for exercising this power. These two powers are as distinct as are the means to be employed for the exercise of them, the Army for defense against external foes, the militia for the suppression of internal resistance, the Army to be created by Congress, because war is a subject of national jurisdiction only; the militia to be created jointly by Congress and the States, because the execution of the laws of the Union and the suppression of insurrections may involve questions of disputed jurisdiction. By these provisions the people were to be protected from interference by such army as Congress might maintain. By this cautious adjustment of these balances did the fathers not only provide against intervention by the standing army, if such should exist, in the internal government of the country, but they also provided that the General Government should, by organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, supply to the States the uniform means of resisting its own aggressions.

That this is the true interpretation of the Constitution is evident not only by the declarations, acts, and circumstances of the period of its formation, but also by the act and by the manner of the act of President Washington in the suppression of the only insurrection which occurred, or which had threatened to occur, during the first half century after the adoption of the Constitution.

In 1794 inhabitants of Western Pennsylvania resisted the collection of the tax on whisky. The United States court of that district was powerless to execute the law and appealed to the United States Government for aid. President Washington, before resorting to force, issued his proclamation commanding the insurgents to disperse. The proclamation failing of effect, the President, in obedience to the Constitution and the law made in pursuance thereof, called forth the militia of Pennsylvania and the adjoining States for the execution of the laws of the Union and the suppression of the insurrection. After the restoration of order Congress manifested its approval of the acts of the President and of the militia by passing the following resolution:

Resolved unanimously, That the thanks of this House be given to the gallant officers and privates of the militia of the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, who on the late call of the President rallied around the standard of the laws, and in the prompt and most severe service which they encountered bore the most illustrious testimony to the value of the Constitution and the blessings of internal peace and order.

The language of this resolution embodies the whole spirit of the Constitution on this subject. It thanks the militia who rallied around the standard of the laws, and bore illustrious testimony to the value of the Constitution.

Here, sir, is testimony, in letters of living light, to the correctness of this interpretation of the Constitution, by many of the very men who framed that unequaled instrument, given within six years after its adoption, expressive of their satisfaction with its adaptability to the demands of that critical emergency, the first trial of its strength. The instrument, moved by its constructors, proved the harmony of its powers by the unity of its strength.

RÉSUMÉ AS TO THE INTENTION OF THE FATHERS IN REGARD TO THE STANDING ARMY AND THE MILITIA.

This evidence establishes—

First. That the fathers knew that history recorded the fact that standing armies destroy the liberties of the people.

Second. That dread and detestation of standing armies were the most prominent characteristics of the colonial and revolutionary period.

Third. That this dread of standing armies found expression in every governmental instrument touching this subject recorded by them.

Fourth. That a standing army was not intended by the framers of the Constitution, and that, if it existed under it, it was to be only in the last resort.

Fifth. That a standing army, if it existed, was to be used only for war, the defense of the frontier against the incursions of Indians, and for manning the forts.

Sixth. That a standing army should not be used for the execution of the laws, nor for suppressing insurrection.

Seventh. That the fathers relied on the militia as the natural defense of a free state, and that they so declared in every governmental paper relating to the subject put forth by them.

Eighth. That they intended the militia to be used as a substitute for a standing army.

Ninth. That they intended the militia should be employed to execute the laws of the Union and to suppress insurrection.

Tenth. That the militia, as a national institution, has been destroyed by neglect.

Eleventh. That a standing army has been raised on the ruins of the militia.

These, sir, are startling facts. Would it not be well now, during this lull in the storm of party strife, for the representatives of the people to ponder them deeply, and inquire whether there is not danger, immense and imminent, in this heedless disregard of the warnings of the fathers and the mandates of the Constitution they framed?

The standing Army as now employed is violative of the Constitution and of the law, which directs the manner of the employment of it. Notwithstanding this plain intent of the Constitution, the standing Army has been largely employed in all sorts of uses, at the request of all sorts of people, without regard even to such law as has been enacted for the direction of its employment in these unconstitutional uses. Generals commanding military departments, north, south, and east, report the employment, hundreds of times, of hundreds of detachments of the standing Army in the suppression of strikes, in the execution of the local laws, in the collection of the revenue, the arrest of offenders, &c., at the request of governors, sheriffs, and other local State civil authorities and United States attorneys, marshals, assistant marshals, and internal-revenue officers, in such open and flagrant violation of law that these generals suggest the enactment of such laws as will define the duties of the soldiery; in evidence of which I now read to the House the following extracts from the report of the General of the Army and of the generals of departments:

NEW YORK, October 8, 1870.

General McDowell, commanding the Department of the East, reports as follows: "On 3d December, in compliance with instructions from the Adjutant-General's Office, Major Abbot, with two companies of engineers, troops from Willet's Point; Major C. L. Best, with two companies from Fort Hamilton, one from Fort Wadsworth, and one from Fort Schuyler; and Lieutenant-Colonel Kiddoo, with four companies from Fort Columbus, all under command of Colonel Vogdes, First United States Artillery, proceeded to Brooklyn to assist Colonel Pleasanton, collector of internal revenue, in the execution of his duties."

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, October 26, 1871.

General Terry, commanding Department of the South, reports as follows: "More than two hundred temporary detachments have been made from garrisons of posts for the purpose of aiding civil officers. These detachments have been made upon the request of governors of States, sheriffs, and other local State civil authorities and United States district attorneys, marshals, and officers of the Internal Revenue department."

DETROIT, MICHIGAN, September 27, 1872.

General Crook reports as follows: "In May last fifteen hundred of these miners in the vicinity of Houghton combined in a strike; they became nearly all armed and at last not only defied the civil authorities but rescued prisoners, disarmed the sheriff's posse, and threatened the peaceably disposed. The governor of the State presenting to me official proof of this state of things, received by telegraph May 11, made very urgent application for military assistance. The emergency appearing great, I determined to give the immediate aid of a military posse."

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, October 1, 1872.

General Terry reports one hundred and sixty temporary detachments as in 1871, for these purposes.

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, September 30, 1874.

General Terry reports forty-two temporary detachments to aid revenue officers.

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, October 19, 1875.

General McDowell reports thirty-seven detachments to aid revenue officers.

ATLANTA, GEORGIA, September 30, 1876.

General Ruger reports seventy-one detachments to aid civil officers. Hundreds more have been made. So glaring and frequent had the violations of all law become that the generals, in defense of their honor and interests, made earnest protests against these practices, recommending the passage of laws defining more accurately the duties of the soldiery. An educated soldier could not fail to understand the immense responsibility he incurred not only to a newly elected President whose more acute understanding of the law would compel him to take measures for the removal of such officers as had thus defiantly violated it, but also to local authorities within whose jurisdiction these violations occurred. Therefore the General of the Army, Sherman, in his report of June 10, 1870, says: "In the examination of the reports herewith I invite your attention to the recommendation of General Halleck, which refers to the use of troops in assisting the civil authorities in maintaining peace, collecting the revenue, &c., which has become so common of late. The duties of the soldiery in this connection are not prescribed by statute so clear that the officers can understand their rights and duties, and the civil agents and authorities often expect more than can be rightfully and lawfully done. I think that soldiers ought not to be expected to made individual arrests, or to do any act of violence except in their organized capacity as a posse comitatus duly summoned by the United States marshal, and acting in his presence."

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, October 24, 1870.

General Halleck in his report said: "I respectfully repeat the recommendation of my last annual report that military officers should not interfere in local civil differences, unless called out in the manner provided by law, and that requisitions of revenue officers should be accompanied by affidavits or some other proofs that the case comes within the provisions of the law authorizing or requiring military interference. As the case now is the revenue officer is the judge of the necessity of military guards and escorts. * * * When United States marshals and assistant marshals call for military aid to execute the process of the courts there should be an order of court authorizing such requisition on the ground that no proper posse comitatus could be obtained. Such restriction on the use of military force in civil matters would in my opinion not only afford a large saving in military expenditure but relieve Army officers from much of the responsibility which they are now obliged to incur in the performance of disagreeable duties which can hardly be said to legitimately belong to the military service. It may be proper to remark in this place that I have been assured by Federal civil officers that the use of troops in executing judicial process and enforcing the revenue and other civil laws, seems to increase rather than diminish the necessity of resorting to such force in civil matters. The ill-disposed become more and more exasperated by being coerced by force which they think has been unconstitutionally employed against them, and the better disposed relax their efforts to punish local crimes on the plea that this duty now devolves on the military. Hence in the case of a robbery or murder there is a call on Federal troops to arrest and guard the criminals. It is therefore a question well worthy of consideration, whether the military in civil matters should not be limited to a few well-defined cases, such as riots and insurrections, which cannot be suppressed by local and State authorities."

October 27, 1871, General Halleck again reiterated these recommendations.

Here spoke a soldier whose cultivation, sense of duty, and exalted patriotism impelled him to an independent expression of a well considered opinion. His proud spirit towered above the debasement which would have degraded him to the level of a pliant tool in obedience to the power by which his fortunes might rise or fall. These reports exhibit that not only have hundreds of detachments of an unconstitutional force, the standing Army, been precipitated on the States, but that these detachments have been used in a manner violative of the law intended to restrain the use of the constitutional force, the militia.

The law of 1792, under which President Washington called out the militia to suppress the whisky insurrection, (resistance to the collection of the tax on whiskey,) was re-enacted by sections 5297, 5298, 5299, and 5300 of the Revised Statutes; to which, however, is appended an unconstitutional amendment. This law of 1792 prescribed the conditions on which the constitutional force, the militia, could be used for the execution of the laws and the suppression of insurrection; not one of which were complied with before these detachments of the standing Army were precipitated on the people. No application had been made to the President, as prescribed by the law of 1792 and the law of to-day. No proclamation was made as required by the law of 1792 and the law of to-day. Governors, sheriffs, and other State and local civil officers, and United States district attorneys, assistant marshals, marshals, collectors of revenue, and other revenue officers, requested these generals, and these generals at the request of these officers precipitated these troops upon the people.

If this may be done in one district may it not be done in all the districts? If so, and the interest of a President demands, may he not use this power for his own purposes? May he not by this means subject every reluctant commander to the order of any political miscreant he may choose to make an assistant collector of revenue, until the whole Army is under his control, and then provoke the resistance he seeks for the employment of force and in the name of order substitute his will for law?

On what pretense will this practice be defended? The life of the Republic is no longer imperiled. The surrender at Appomattox concluded the case which passion had appealed to the court of arms; the contestants on the southern side of the record had accepted the decision in good faith, and history attests the scrupulous honor with which they obeyed the authority of the court. The generals report these practices as occurring between 1870 and 1877, five years after the surrender and continuing until now. Moreover, some of them occurred in Michigan, some in New York; certainly these States never imperiled the life of the Republic. What statute authorizes the practice? If there be such a statute, if the law has authorized such practice, then the Republic has descended to the lowest depth—a despotism sanctioned by law and accepted without protest by the people, the gloom of despair. No, sir; I thank God that no such statute exists, and I trust the day may never arrive when a Congress of the United States will become so servile as to enact such a law.

No, sir, this is not sanctioned by any statute of the United States, but practiced under a misconstruction of a statute, by which it is attempted to use the standing Army as a posse comitatus. It is provided by the Revised Statutes, section 788:

That marshals and their deputies shall have in each State the same powers in executing the laws of the United States that the sheriffs and their deputies may have, by law, in executing the laws thereof.

Under the laws of the several States the sheriffs have the power to summon the posse comitatus, which posse consists of all knights, gentlemen, yeomen, husbandmen, laborers, tradesmen, servants, and apprentices, and all other such persons above the age of fifteen years that are able to travel, (Dalton's Office Sheriffs, 354,) which definition existed from the earliest to the present time. No one, I presume, will attempt to maintain that a sheriff has the right to summon the Army of the United states to serve as a posse. If the sheriff cannot, how can the marshal? The authority is exactly the same. Fortunately the interpretation of the statute was made by those who framed it in 1795. The section 788 of the Revised Statutes is section 9 of the law of 1795, which law of 1795 is entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." The action of President Washington was in perfect accord with this interpretation during the whisky insurrection. The revenue laws (the tax on whisky) were resisted. The court of the district was powerless; it notified the President; the President called out the militia, and Congress thanked the militia—not the standing Army summoned as a posse, but the militia called forth by the President.

This attempt to clothe the marshals, the lowest officers of the United States courts, with authority to use a standing army as a posse comitatus had its origin in an opinion of Mr. Attorney-General Cushing. (6 Opinions of the Attorneys-General.)

It must forever be regretted that this learned lawyer should so far have forgotten what was due, alike to the cause of liberty, to the fathers who framed the Constitution, and to his own honor, as to write an opinion so utterly without foundation in law, which sought to facilitate the use of a standing army against his fellow-countrymen. Who reads this opinion in the light of the attending circumstances, as shown in the history of the times, will learn how a great lawyer may warp the law and the Constitution of his country to answer the demands of an emergency threatening to destroy the hopes of his unprincipled ambition.

In all the law of all the past, whose treasures are said to be obedient to his demand, this learned lawyer could find in support of this opinion, so pregnant with evil, not one enactment, not one judicial decision. His sole authority is Lord Mansfield, not as a judge, but as a statesman; not his decision on the bench, but from a debate in the House of Lords on the Gordon riots, when nearly eighty years had impaired his understanding, when the burning of his vast library had roused his anger, and threats against his life had quickened his fears. On this mere assertion Mr. Cushing has based this infamous opinion, although he must have known that in that very debate the Duke of Richmond, Lord North, and Mr. Fox suggested an act of indemnity to hold harmless the soldiers whose employment in the suppression of the mob had violated the law and offended the spirit of English liberty. And he knew further that the riot which occasioned that debate was of such proportions as to be treated as treason; that more than one hundred thousand men participated in it, and its leader, Lord George Gordon, was tried for treason and was saved by the influence of a strong family and the plea of a weak brain. This riot occurred nine years prior to the adoption of the American Constitution, and the employment of the army for its suppression may have been one of the uses of a standing army against which the fathers sought to provide when they indicated that a standing army, if it existed, was to be used only for defense in war, and the militia for the execution of the laws in peace.

If, sir, under this statute, as interpreted by Mr. Cushing's opinion, the standing Army of the United States can be used as a posse comitatus for the execution of the laws, we are living under a military despotism unqualified and absolute, for what is military despotism but the use of troops against the people without due authority of law? It matters not how many the troops, nor by whom commanded, whether a platoon by a corporal or an army by a general, whether directed by a deputy collector of revenue or the President of the United States; nor, sir, is the tyranny to be measured by the number of its victims; whether one person or one million have suffered, the Constitution is equally violated, the spirit of liberty equally offended. Disguise it as we may the despotism is as thorough as that attempted by Strafford and accomplished by Monk. Resistance cost Strafford his head, submission cost the people their liberty. In the short space of twenty years the liberty-loving compeers of Hampden had degenerated into the luxury-loving slaves of Charles. It is to be feared that the heroes on both sides of the line have in a short time, from 1860 to 1878, given signs of the same degeneration. It is not the fear of bodily harm, but love of luxury that makes men cowards and slaves.

MR. HAYES'S SECRETARY OF WAR, THE STANDING ARMY, AND THE WORK PEOPLE.

Hon. George W. McCrary, Mr. Hayes's Secretary of War, in his report of June 30, 1877, thus expresses the policy of the present administration:

Furthermore, it must now be accepted as a fact, which experience has demonstrated, that Federal troops may be required not only for the protection of our frontiers, but also to preserve peace and order in our more populous interior. * * * The Army is to the United States what a well-disciplined and trained police force is to a city, and the one is quite as necessary as the other. Those who oppose any increase in the Army do so upon the theory that the local militia is sufficient for all the purposes of preserving the peace and suppressing local uprisings. * * * Our fathers who framed the Constitution, and who were not without experience on this point, doubted the wisdom of relying upon the militia and so provided for the employment of the Federal troops for this purpose. If this seemed necessary to them in the early period of our history, when our population was largely rural, and the spectacle seldom or never witnessed of large masses of men idle, suffering, and desperate, how much more necessary is the same thing now. As our country increases in population and wealth, and as great cities become numerous, it must be clearly seen that there may be great danger of uprisings of large masses of people for the redress of grievances real or fancied; and it is a well-known fact that such uprisings enlist in a greater or less degree the sympathies of the communities in which they occur.

In view of these considerations, it is respectfully recommended that authority be given to the President to increase the strength of the depleted companies now embraced within the Army organization.

This open avowal by this fearless War Secretary of an administration distinguished for its peculiar disregard of the interests of the people is too defiant of the American spirit of public liberty to be permitted to pass unrebuked, and demonstrates but too plainly how a pretended representative of the people may become so hardened by his votes in support of unconstitutional measures as to be the fittest instrument for the execution of them.

I thank this Secretary of this non-elected President, this war minister of the crown, for this bold attempt to justify the unconstitutional means by which his master was enabled to usurp the place he holds. Again and again I thank this undisguised advocate of imperial power for this unmistakable declaration of his purpose to employ the same means, the standing Army, to reward those who assisted at the consummation of that loathsome wrong. I thank him too that, in this attempt to justify that wrong and to reward those who assisted at its perpetration, he has appealed to "our fathers who framed the Constitution" in support of the dangerous doctrine that a standing army was intended to police the States, and by asserting that they ("the fathers") doubted the wisdom of relying upon the militia and so provided for the employment of the Federal troops for this purpose.

Here, sir, and now, in the presence of these the Representatives of forty-eight millions of people claiming to be free I join issue with this Secretary, who so unpardonably misrepresents the intent of "our fathers who framed the Constitution." I proclaim that not only did "our fathers who framed the Constitution" not intend that the standing Army, if it existed, should be used for the execution of the laws of the Union and the suppression of insurrection, but that they did intend it should not be used for that purpose, and also that they did intend that the local militia should be the only reliance for the suppression of domestic violence, and further that they did intend to obviate necessity for a standing army by organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia.

In the earlier part of this argument I quoted largely and with distinct references the exact language of "our fathers who framed the Constitution" in evidence of their dread of and hostility to standing armies. In every page of the history of the earlier period, long before, at the time of, and long after the adoption of the Constitution, the warnings against the dangers of standing armies are loud, distinct, and constant. Everywhere these warnings appear. In the controversies between the mother-country and the colonies, in the Declaration of Independence, in the constitutions of the States, in the Articles of Confederation, in the debates in the conventions which adopted the Constitution, in the Constitution, in the letters of Washington, in the speeches of the members of the earlier Congresses, in the enactments of those Congresses, in the history of the whisky insurrection of 1794, in the reluctance with which the earlier Congresses consented to the formation of a standing army—first only eight hundred and forty, privates, non-commissioned officers, and musicians; next twelve hundred and sixteen; next nine hundred and ninety-two—limiting the employment of them to the defense of the frontier, in the aversion to the employment of a major-general, (if only for a few months,) in the repeated declarations that standing armies were not to be employed for the execution of the laws, nor for the suppression of insurrection, in the emphasis with which it was insisted that the militia was to be used for this purpose, in the doubt as to whether the Constitution contemplated a standing army in peace at all, in the advocacy of conferring power on the United States Government to call out the militia, that it might be made a substitute for a standing army, and especially in these words of the "Father of the Constitution," Mr. Madison:

> A standing army is one of the greatest mischiefs that can possibly happen. * * * The Constitution does not say a standing army shall be called out to execute the laws. * * * The militia ought to be called out to suppress smugglers. Will this be denied? * * * If riot should happen the militia are proper to quell it, to prevent resort to another mode. (2 Elliott, 287.)

And in these words of Mr. Alexander Hamilton, the aristocrat and centralizationist of the Constitution:

> It is said standing armies are not provided against in the Constitution, and hence it is inferred they would exist under it. This inference, from the very form of the proposition, is at best but uncertain and problematic. * * * The attention of the Government ought particularly to be directed to the formation of a select corps of militia of moderate size, upon such principles as would fit it for service in time of need. This, it appears to me, is the only possible substitute for a standing army and the best possible security against it if it should exist.—Federalist.

As late as the Congress of 1809, John Randolph expressed the same dread of a standing army in these words:

> I believe that they (the people of the United States) are not content and never would be content to see a standing army, fully equipped, armed, and disciplined, while the militia, our defense against internal as well as external enemies, remained unarmed and defenseless * * * The people who will consent to remain unarmed while arms are put in the hands of a standing army, governed by martial law, are ripe for a master.

In the Congress of 1810 Mr. Potter, of Rhode Island, expressed like apprehension. Speaking of the militia, he said:

> If this shall not be found to answer the expectation of military men, and we shall hereafter have a President of more military habits, the next change would be a large standing army. And this is the way republicanism usually slides into despotism.

I will not cumulate more testimony. Already this astute and able lawyer is overwhelmed. On this record I claim an acquittal of "our fathers who framed the Constitution" of the heinous charge he has attempted to fix upon their hitherto unblemished reputation, and I demand that the Government be administered according to their intention, and that, in obedience to the plain letter of the Constitution, the militia of the country be organized, armed, and disciplined, that, according to the intent of that instrument, it may be employed when necessary for the execution of the laws and the suppression of insurrection; and the standing army be not used to "suppress the uprising of large masses of people for the redress of grievances, real or imaginary, enlisting in a less or greater degree the sympathies of the communities in which they occur."

How slight, sir, is the partition between this power claimed by this war minister of the Crown and that which merges the political rights of the citizen in the divine right of kings. It behooves this House to take care that his means be reduced and his powers be circumscribed.

DEFENSE OF THE MILITIA.

The use of the standing army and the increase of it as practiced and advocated by the administration of Mr. Hayes and its friends lead to a review of the events which gave rise to that argument.

The reckless extravagance ever engendered by civil strife culminated in the crash of 1873. The contraction which ensued compelled reduction in the wages of many of the working people and the discharge of many others. The high rate of taxes caused by increased debt and the high price of bread and meat, caused by large exports of these necessaries, worked hardship. The masses became discontented and sought redress through strikes.

Associated capital, burdened by responsibilities incurred during inflation, attempted to maintain its dividends on extravagant investments by transferring those burdens from the corporations to their servants, and further reductions ensued. These servants inquiring as to the necessity for these hardships were surprised to learn that not only was it sought to maintain those dividends on the original stock and on the stock created out of the earnings of these corporations, known as watered stock, but that the amount of those dividends in excess of the legal interest of the States in which these corporations were located would in some cases, if applied to the pay-roll, admit an increase of wages of more than 30 per cent. This knowledge intensified the discontent. These faithful servants could not consent that unmarried men should be induced to accept the wages which hungered their own families, and disorder ensued. Unfortunately for themselves, the corporations, and society, these men overstepped the limits of the law, which indiscretion resulted in what Mr. Secretary McCrary describes "as uprisings of idle, suffering, desperate men for the redress of grievances, real or fancied, having the sympathies of the communities in which they occur," and for the suppression of which he asks an increase of the standing army to police the States, meaning thereby to transfer the terror of his bayonets from the South to the North.

In some of the States where these disorders occurred, as in West Virginia, where no police existed and the militia had decayed, the civil authorities were powerless. But it must be remembered that that State had not recovered from the disorganization consequent on the war. Moreover, militia organization at the South might have been misconstrued.

In Pennsylvania, where the greatest disorder existed, political interest had subordinated public safety and blinded the civil authorities to the growing lawlessness of sworn associations, until immediate restraint by the militia, inadequately officered, became impossible. In New York, New Jersey, Ohio, and Indiana the civil authority, and its subordinate, the militia, preserved or soon restored the peace.

In Baltimore City, the metropolis of Maryland, a police force of five hundred men, composed of the best possible material, organized and disciplined and led by officers whose capacity, courage, fidelity, and humanity commanded the respect of the most lawless, by temperate and judicious exercise of their power checked the violence of the misguided men whom the ill-judged policy of associated capital had exasperated to madness. This triumph of the civil authorities by means of the police, a citizen soldiery, is the highest evidence of the capabilities of a well-trained militia for suppression of domestic violence.

Unfortunately that same capital became needlessly alarmed at imaginary dangers in a distant part of the State and demanded military aid. The military alarm was sounded. Less than five hundred militia, the entire force of the city, and more than five thousand exasperated men answered that call. It is much and deeply to be regretted that some of the members of the less-disciplined regiment, without orders, but in self-defense, fired on the mob, and loss of life ensued. The better-disciplined regiment marched, amid the most exasperating demonstrations, with the courage and precision of veterans to the depot of the railroad company, then threatened by countless numbers, protected the endangered property, and guarded the prisoners captured by the police without the loss of a single life. Thus five hundred police and three hundred militia, all citizen soldiery, held at bay the turbulent element of a city of four hundred thousand inhabitants, proving themselves efficient conservators of the peace, in a violent conflict between labor and capital, until the body of the people were enrolled to prevent a recurrence of the disorder and the passions of the mob had cooled. Soon the sober second thought set in. To their credit be it spoken, many of those very men whom exasperation had driven to the front of the strike were foremost at the restoration of the order they had so inconsiderately disturbed. An acknowledgment of the sufficiency of the citizen soldiery of Baltimore, its police and militia is to be found in the modest assumption of the Secretary of War in his report before referred to.

This incident attests the wisdom of "our fathers who framed the Constitution" in assigning to the militia the high function of executing the laws and suppressing insurrection. Nor can the advocates of the use of a standing army for policing the States nor of the despotic government which that army is intended to establish, whether they be high functionaries of the government or not, break the force of these examples by proclaiming the insufficiency of the militia, except in those instances where it has been weakened by political demagogues or neglected and repressed by the national administration.

It will not be maintained that the militia has always been equal to every occasion. What soldiers have? But he has read the history of his country in vain who has not learned that its military character has been formed on the achievements of its militia.

The colonist, whether of English, Celtic, or German blood, brought with him the love of liberty and hatred of tyranny that marked his life in the elder land. Life in the wilderness cultivated these virtues. Want compelled labor, labor gave strength, strength courage, so that whether he landed at Jamestown, Plymouth, or Saint Mary's he became the militia-man of freedom. The pioneer, of whatever period, has been the militia-man of the frontier. His was the mission to subdue, not only the wilderness, but its savage inhabitant. The rifle was his means of subsistence and defense. To the hunter, the woodsman, the plowman, it was his constant companion. His house became his fort—the defense of his wife and children the object of his utmost vigilance. The minute-man of his home was well trained to become the minute-man of the State. The Indian wars of two hundred years prove the efficiency of his education. King Philip, Tecumseh, Black Hawk, and their dusky following, yielded by slow but sure retreat a continent to their prowess. The militia won the liberties of their country. They fought the battles of the Revolution. Every field from Lexington to Yorktown attests their devotion. Sometimes reluctant, sometimes in panic, but through all suffering and through all disaster triumphant, and the world breathes freer for their sacrifice. The war of 1812 was fought mainly by the militia. The most brilliant of its victories were won by militia alone over the best regulars the world has ever seen, the soldiers of Wellington, commanded by the ablest of his generals. Plattsburgh and New Orleans will live forever. Washington and Greene, Jackson and McComb, and their hero comrades were militia all, whose glories are bright and enduring as those of the ablest mercenary that ever fought for pay.

The militia-man is part of his country; he is identified with it by all his interests, feelings, and ambitions; his home, wife, and children are among its treasures; he rests in its peace and thrives in its prosperity; he finds protection under its Constitution, assists at its government, and abides by its laws; he contributes to its support and offers his life in its defense; its history is the record of the achievements of his fathers; he shares its glory and its shame. If he survives the danger that called to the field he returns to the body of the people, resumes the duties of civil life, and again contributes to the taxes he does not consume. Such is the militia-man this Government, the agent of the people, refuses to organize, arm, and discipline for the execution of the laws and the suppression of insurrection.

"Our fathers who framed the Constitution" thought the militia had been "the natural defense of a free State," whether as Roman citizen, member of a European guild, or of a train band of London-town; or whether as a Swiss mountaineer, a Saxon forester, or an English yeoman, king, or baron, had found in him a friend when king or baron was friend of freedom. But the militia has none of the personal inducements that tempt the administrators of government to assist at its support, therefore it has been neglected or repressed and a standing army raised on its ruins.

A regular is the reverse of all this. He is a soldier by trade; he lives by blood! His is a business apart from the people. His condition works a severance of interest. He consumes what they create. He seldom marries; nor does he accumulate property, nor form and continue social relations; his habits unfit him for the relations of civil life; he enlists and re-enlists, becomes a permanent part of the military establishment of the country, and looks to its bounty for pension or asylum as the refuge of his old age. The order of his superior is his only law. At the command of that superior he fights for or against the laws, the constitution, the country under which or in which he lives, in turn its master or its slave. He sacks, desecrates, indulges when and where he dares. He serves, obeys, destroys, kills, suffers, and dies for pay. He is a mercenary whom sloth, luxury, and cowardice hires to protect its ease, enjoyment, and life. Such is the soldier whom "our fathers who framed the Constitution" refused to intrust with the execution of the laws and the suppression of insurrection. "Our fathers who framed the Constitution" thought him "dangerous to public liberty" and dreaded and detested him, and declared he ought not to exist. The danger of standing armies they learned both from their own experience and from the lessons history taught; whether as Roman legions, pretorian guards, or janizaries they oppressed the people; whether the instruments of German or Russian emperors or of French or Spanish kings they riveted the chains of nations. Whether great or small the fathers sought to avoid their existence and restrain their use. Mr. Madison said, "If small they are inconvenient, if large they may be fatal."

Yet despite the dread, the detestation, and warnings of "our fathers who framed the Constitution," a standing Army exists, and it has its uses too; albeit neither the Army nor its uses were contemplated by them. Cadetships for sons, employment for dependents, commands for friends, contracts for retainers, pensions for the disabled, retired lists for the superannuated, the pomp and circumstance of war, the pride and power of social intercourse, and the intermarriage that constitutes a governmental aristocracy, and hence the munificence of the appropriations—all these constitute the standing Army, the creation, the favorite, the instrument of the Government, and explain why the militia has been neglected or repressed and this dangerous power erected on its ruins. The future Gibbon, pondering our past from this early present, as he writes the decline and fall of this vast Republic, will fail to find an adequate reason why the descendants of Otis and Henry, Mason and Gerry, should, within so short a time, have substituted a dangerous Army for a safe militia, and will start at the rapid strides so young a people had made from the principles of liberty as taught and practiced by the administration of George Washington to the principles of despotism as taught and practiced by the administration of Rutherford B. Hayes. Let it never be forgotten that it was the velvet foot of the politic Augustus which softly stole from the tribune to the throne, nor that the pretorian guard, the standing Army of Rome, sold and resold that gorgeous throne. Well will it be for the future if in this lull of party strife, not long to be continued, we, the Representatives of the people, dignified by their confidence and responsible for its abuse, examine the fearful progress we have made and retrace our steps to the paths we have left.

THE FRONTIER, THE INDIANS, THE STANDING ARMY.

In order to approximate sound conclusions as to the number of troops necessary to repel Indian invasion it is important to review, as fully as time will permit, the defense of the frontier from the early period.

In 1789, the first year of the administration of President Washington, the territory of the United States consisted of somewhat more than eight hundred thousand square miles, containing less than four million inhabitants—about five to a square mile. The whites occupied a territory along the Atlantic, extending less than two hundred miles inland, being about one fifth of this area and less than twenty-five persons to a square mile, the great majority of them living near the Atlantic coast. The remaining four-fifths of this territory was inhabited by nearly two hundred thousand Indians, the most warlike on the continent. Except at some forts in the Northwest, a few missionary stations, and trading posts, the white man was unknown. It was a trackless wilderness. The Spanish possessions on the south and west extended from the mouth of the Saint Mary's on the Atlantic westerly along the northern boundary of Florida to the Mississippi River, thence northerly along the river and across the land to the Lake of the Woods on the Canada line. The English possessions, then as now, extended from the Lake of the Woods to the southeast corner of what is now the State of Maine, making a frontier thirty-five hundred miles long.

These two powerful nations, hating democratic institutions, struggling for commercial supremacy, traded with the Indians within and without the United States, and supplied them with arms, munitions, and whisky, and instigated them to depredations, arson, and murder.

Sustained by them and allied with kindred tribes, these Indians were formidable foes. War between them and the whites was unremitting and merciless. The war-whoop was heard even east of the Blue Ridge; and the settler often found the family he left a few hours before, brained and scalped, and his house in ashes. No time, no place, no condition was safe.

Exposed to the attacks of these formidable foes, open and secret, the infant Republic emerged from an exhaustive war and entered upon an experimental government with neither money nor credit. The trackless wilderness extending from the Alleghanies to the Mississippi was known only to a few daring hunters and trappers. Undismayed it met and overcame every difficulty. Without roads, without any but the most cumbrous means of transportation, without any but such rude rafts or boats as could not be made to ascend the streams; for fourteen years, until the period of the cession of Louisiana, hardy pioneers pushed on the settlements. Every advance was defended with stubborn courage, the frontiersmen being their own militia, aided at times by the few enlisted men whom Congress could be induced reluctantly to employ. The number of these enlisted men, according to such information as can now be obtained, did not average for the fourteen years more than twenty-five hundred men.

In this connection I have read with great attention the very able and elaborate argument in support of this large standing Army made by the distinguished soldier and statesman, late a governor of the State of Texas and now an influential member of this House. I have derived much information from the great array of statistics he presents; but I confess to great surprise when he attempts to justify this large standing Army by an exhibition of its proportion to the number of his fellow-citizens. In how far he can measure the necessity for a standing Army by the number of the citizens of his country, I am utterly at a loss to comprehend, unless he proposes to use that army against those citizens. Has that distinguished soldier and statesman, heretofore the proclaimed friend of liberty, become a convert to the published theory of Mr. Hayes's Secretary, the war minister of the crown, Hon. George W. McCrary, that "it must now be accepted as a fact, which experience has demonstrated, that Federal troops may be required, not only to protect the frontiers, but also to preserve peace and order in our own more populous interior?" If so distinguished a friend of liberty, whose home is so far removed from the corrupting influences of the Capitol, has become a convert to such doctrines, then this House may take warning of the danger impending by the facility with which this doctrine of centralization promulgated here has found echo from the frontier. It was the Gallic legions Cæsar led to Rome.

The only foe against which "our fathers who framed the Constitution" intended the standing Army, if it existed, should be used was a foreign foe. The only foreign foe these United States will ever have to meet is the Indian, if foe the poor Indian may be called. Therefore I prefer to measure the Army, not as against my fellow-citizens, but as against the Indian. To do this I propose to exhibit the strength of the Army at those periods when neither apprehension of foreign war, existing war, nor the result of war increased its strength.

During the fourteen years extending from 1789 to 1803, the period of the cession of Louisiana, the standing Army of the United States did not exceed an average of twenty-five hundred men. During the same period the Indians, men, women, and children, south of the Saint Lawrence and east of the Mississippi, were variously estimated at upward of one hundred and eighty thousand. These Indians had the secret aid of England and Spain and the open aid of all the Indians within communication. As 2,500 soldiers were to 180,000 Indians so was 1 soldier to that proportion of Indians, which was 1 soldier to 72 Indians. The cession of Louisiana added more than a million of square miles to the United States, more than doubling the size of its territory. The Indians who roamed that immense domain increased the number of Indians within the United States largely beyond the original number. Yet the American State Papers exhibit that the average strength of the standing Army from 1803 to 1809, inclusive, did not exceed 2,726 men; certainly no increase in the proportion of soldiers to Indians.

In 1820, when after the war with England the Army was adjusted to a peace establishment, it numbered 6,000 men; estimating the Indians at a mean between the 180,000 of 1789 and 200,000 of to-day they number 230,000, making the proportion of soldiers to Indians about 1 soldier to 40 Indians.

In 1850, twelve years after the peace with Mexico, which added another million of square miles to the United States and its proportion of Indians, the Army was 13,000 strong. Assuming that the Indians have not decreased since then the proportion of soldiers to Indians was 1 soldier to 22 Indians.

In 1878 the Army is 25,000 strong. The Indians, men, women, and children, after deducting 60,000 civilized, are only 230,000, making the proportion of soldiers to Indians 1 soldier to 9 Indians.

This mode of adjusting the size of the Army to the number of its foes has, I believe, been the usage of all the great captains, albeit the result of the process is not very flattering to the capacity of the Army of to-day.

This comparison of the past with the present shows that in 1818 1 soldier was equal to 70 Indians, and that in 1878 1 soldier is equal to only 9 Indians.

And although economy is not exactly the object of this argument, I may be pardoned for showing that in 1808 it cost less than $5 to keep one Indian in subjection, and that in 1878 it cost $137 to effect the same object; although modern invention has converted the mobilized soldier into a migratory citadel and multiplied indefinitely his death-dealing power.

It does seem to me that with the money appropriated for the Indian Bureau, to be applied to the irritation of poor Lo by withholding his supplies, and the money appropriated for the War Department, to be applied for his pacification by the distribution of powder and ball, he might be accommodated at our comfortable hotels and thus avoid all excuse for maintaining the Army, which Mr. Hayes's amiable Secretary, Mr. McCrary, proposes to apply to the suppression of the "uprisings of large masses of idle, suffering, and desperate men, sympathized with by the communities in which these occur."

The expenditures for these humane purposes have been enormous.

For the twenty-eight years from 1851 to 1878, inclusive, the appropriations for the Indian Bureau amount to about	$98,000,000 00
For the ten years before the war, 1851 to 1860, inclusive, the appropriations for the Army, including rivers, harbors, and fortifications, amounted to	141,911,051 12
For ten years after the war, 1868 to 1878, inclusive, appropriations for the Army, exclusive of rivers, harbors, and fortifications, amounted to	297,260,325 21
Making the total for irritation of the Indian by the bureau and his pacification by the Army	537,171,376 33
To which add for that part of the Army employed in observing the Indians from 1861 to 1868, inclusive, at the rate only which the Army cost from 1851 to 1860, say $14,000,000 for eight years	112,000,000 00
Making a total for the irritation of the Indian by the bureau and his pacification by the Army for twenty-eight years	649,171,376 33

about one-third of the amount of the great national debt. Certainly the Indian has proved to be a very extravagant luxury.

The analysis of these figures shows another condition not altogether unworthy of notice:

The cost of the Indian Bureau for the ten years from 1851 to 1860, inclusive, under democratic administration, amounted to something more than	$20,000,000 00
The cost of the Indian Bureau for ten years from 1869 to 1878, inclusive, under republican administration, amounted to something more than	54,000,000 00 being thirty-four millions or 170 per cent. more under republican than democratic rule for the same number of years.

The cost of the Army, including river, harbor, and fortifications, for the ten years from 1851 to 1860, inclusive, under democratic rule, amounted to nearly	$142,000,000 00
The cost of the Army, exclusive of rivers, harbors, and fortifications, for ten years from 1869 to 1878, inclusive, under republican rule, amounted to more than	297,000,000 00 being one hundred and fifty-five millions or about 112 per cent. more under republican than under democratic rule for the same number of years.

Making the cost of ten years of republican administration over the cost of ten years of democratic administration of these two Departments, the Indian Bureau and War Department, both periods of profound peace, the enormous sum of $189,000,000—or more than 116 per cent. more than it cost under democratic rule—a loss of $189,000,000 to the labor of the country.

CONCLUSION.

That the people of this country, who within one hundred years have increased its area from eight hundred thousand to thirty-six hundred thousand square miles, its population from four millions to forty-eight millions, its States from thirteen to thirty-eight; who have organized governments over all its territory, bridged its broadest rivers and ascended to their highest sources, leaped its valleys, crossed its deserts, pierced, cleft, and climbed its mountains, compelled the earth to yield from its surface food for distant millions and from its bowels precious stores for their use, and in a frenzied revelry sent millions of brothers to meet in mortal strife—that they should permit two hundred and thirty thousand Indians, men, women, and children, without the means to conduct or prolong an earnest war, to compel them to maintain an army of twenty-five thousand soldiers, at a cost of nearly $32,000,000 per annum, seems to be an incomprehensible absurdity, and indicates such utter indifference to the affairs of the Government as to make it possible for its administrators to perpetuate any condition for purposes not too broadly seen. That practices existed in connection with the Indian Bureau and War Department by which immense sums were squandered was well understood; but these little extravagances were of too small consequence to rouse the facile servants of a too prosperous people. Besides, it was good for trade! But now that other practices and recent declarations indicate worse purposes of the greatest magnitude, public safety demands a change of system for the management of this stupendous business—that we return to the ways whereby our fathers set us free.

If this army of twenty-five thousand soldiers be enough for war, then it is too much for peace. In peace the only use for soldiers is to care for the forts. If twenty-five thousand soldiers are necessary to care for the forts, then there are none for the field and the Indians may depredate unchecked, unless the militia be called out. If from twenty-five thousand men troops can be spared for the field, then there are too many for the forts and the excess ought to be discharged. In the days of our fathers, when Indians threatened invasion the militia were called out, and such men as Harrison and Johnson taught these Indians that war was made to secure peace, and peace was secured. No Sitting Bulls escaped from them! When peace was secured the militia returned to their homes and the little army returned to the forts. No Indian Bureau and War Department demanded the cultivation of the Indian that the bureau and Department might have excuse to exist. War meant war. Peace meant peace; compliance or annihilation. Immeasurably better that no Indian roamed the forest or no white man intruded on his range, than the frontier be used as an apology for maintaining an army which, according to recent practices and declarations, may be let loose upon the people at the demand of a class or whenever popular sentiment disputes a usurper's will.

Let the Indian be compelled to make war or keep the peace. Let the Indian Bureau do justice or cease to be. "Our fathers who framed the Constitution" devised the way and set the example; wise will it be to follow in the one and imitate the other. Eleven millions of white people live west of the Mississippi. These afford one million militia, brave, hardy, willing. Twenty thousand of these in the field will in a single campaign settle the peace forever. The interest of militia is peace. The safety of their families and homes demands peace, and peace they will have. Let the representatives of the people take care that they have the opportunity to compel it. The expense of a single soldier is more than $1,200 a year; of 5,000 soldiers six millions a year; half of this sum three millions a year, will give to each of the three hundred congressional districts $10,000 each; $10,000 will be $20 a piece for 500 militia-men; $40 will arm and equip a man. In two years 150,000 militia-men will be ready for discipline; $20 per man each year will pay all expense of disciplining this force. West Point can educate more than the necessary officers. By this means the States and the General Government will have 150,000 militia identified with the peace, order, and liberty of the country. The facility and certainty with which this may be done is attested by the condition of the militia in most of the old States north of Mason and Dixon's line, whose efficiency was so clearly demonstrated during the late disorders.

By this means the purpose of "our fathers who framed the Constitution" will be effected, $3,000,000 will be saved to the public Treasury, and a force constituted upon which to formulate, drill, and discipline the great body of the militia, so that no public enemy, be it white or red, one man or thousands, regulars or mobs, will attempt to obstruct the operation of law. Thus every citizen of whatever condition, secure in all his rights, may peacefully await the correction of every evil subject to amendment by the ballot. This is the theory of this Government as declared by the men who won the liberty of the country and framed the organic law on which it rests. The experience of the present attests their wisdom, and the immediate future commands us to profit by its lessons. They knew the safety of the militia and the danger of standing armies. Large or small, they knew and dreaded their power. They knew that Cæsar conquered the liberties of Rome with five thousand legionaries; that the pretorian guard which sold and resold the Roman throne numbered not more than eight thousand men. They knew that Cromwell, in the sacred name of liberty, with republican soldiers, dispersed the Parliament of England, and as Lord Protector governed what he was pleased to call the commonwealth without assembling the legislative power of the realm; that Monk, a republican general, restored the monarchy he had aided to overthrow with only six thousand troops; that standing armies sustained thrones, compelled conscience, and enslaved the people; and we, their degenerate and irreverent sons, know that, shielded by the power of standing armies, tyrants have reconstructed the governments of States, imposed constitutions on unwilling people, obstructed the ballot by soldiers at the polls, protected minorities in their usurpations, taxed the people without representation, encouraged and defended extortion, maintained thieves and plunderers of the public Treasury, placed soldiers in the capitols of States and excluded the representatives of the people, empowered a corporal to visé the credentials of members of a Legislature, constituted returning boards whereby elections are made void, encouraged and facilitated false returns of an election for President and Vice-President of the United States, conspired to count the electoral votes of the States for these high offices in a manner violative of the Constitution, law, and usage, overawed the House of Representatives so that it consented to postpone the rights of nearly five millions of freemen and seated a man, without color of title, as President of the United States, who is assisted in the administration of the office by the men who aided and abetted the unlawful means by which he obtained unlawful possession. And we know, too, that the General of the Army declared that without a standing army the citizens of the United States are a mob, and that the Lieutenant-General announced his desire to treat the citizens of a State as banditti, and that they have permitted the use of their Army as a posse comitatus to invade the homes, seize the property, imprison the person, and take the lives of citizens. And we know that this war minister of this intruding President, encouraged by the supineness of the people, promulgates the doctrine that a strong Federal force is to be stationed in the neighborhood of the large cities to repress the uprisings of "idle, suffering, and desperate" men for the redress of grievance, well knowing that the vote of these large cities control the political power of such States as New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Missouri, and Maryland, where resides one-third of the political power of the country, thus erecting a military despotism under the form of but upon the ruins of the Republic.

Disorder, or the fear of disorder, is necessary to the success of this despot scheme for the establishment of a stronger Government as it is mildly called. The dormant violence of the party must be aroused in order to assure disturbance among the people. Anarchy is the tyrant's opportunity. Born of a false construction of the Constitution, nurtured into artificial existence by measures at war with the laws of trade, nursed by statesmen who aspired only to success, sustained in its youth by vigorous fanaticism, made corpulent by the spoils of war, enfeebled by too long possession of power, its appetite palled by indulgence, this late powerful republican party languishes for want of stimulating food. Restoration of self-government has given to the South peace, contentment, prosperity. The races live in the harmony which springs from memory of kind association, and sense of mutual dependence. This unwelcome change of condition compels the republican party to look elsewhere for the excitement necessary to its life, other subjects in other localities. The distressed condition of the work-people at the North supplies opportunity for the experiment. The isms which sprang, ready-armed, from the brain of republicanism are concentrating for a feverish existence in communism. This monster seeks to force or rend its mother. Alarmed at its frantic folly, the immense wealth of the party trembles at its rage, while the subtle leaders laugh at their fear and magnify the danger in justification of this demand for an increase of the Army. Hence the quickening cry of commune. That this vulture is made to gnaw at the vitals of our liberty is shown by the haste with which dupes echo the voice of the incendiaries directed to alarm capital by this senseless cry, and by the persistency with which the pensioned press misrepresents the assemblages of "idle, suffering, desperate men," supplicating for work, at almost any price, as organizations for the destruction of society. Disturbed at imaginary danger, every goose gabbles an alarm for the safety of property, as though communism could exist in a country where the people make the laws and land is to be had on credit at one dollar and a quarter per acre. Communism is the distorted offspring of hopeless oppression, suffering, and want. It sickens and dies in the presence of free institutions.

Thanks to "our fathers who framed the Constitution," the people have peaceful means for the redress of grievance. By intelligent exercise of the ballot at the frequently recurring elections they may change both the law-making and law-executing power. Thanks to their intelligence, the work-people awake to their sense of this power. The action of their late most important convention indicates that they comprehend the situation; that they have learned that peace, not violence, is the condition and means of their triumph; that lawful power is their weapon and shield; that theirs is not only the "might that slumbers in the peasant's arm," but the force that acts through a freeman's vote; that by an intelligent exercise of the ballot they may reduce the cost of the Government to the lowest possible cent by reduction of salaries and abolishment of sinecures, enforce just taxation, repeal and prevent class legislation, remove imposts from raw material, establish ocean lines to profitable ports, so that by reducing the cost of American manufactures, without reducing American wages, the products of American labor may compete for the markets of the world and thus revive the languishing industries of the land. Imperious want compels the study of their interests. Organized power will compel official obedience and make their ballots the fiats of their will. They will not be induced, instigated, or provoked to check by violence the sure but slow return of better times by those whose lust for power prompts them to evoke disorder that they may offer to property the protection of force.

Fear of the people is the chronic cowardice of luxurious civilization. It seeks to be saved from the just burdens of government. It prefers bullets to ballots, mercenaries to militia, and demands for a class the protection of a throne. For this to-day it raises or echoes the cry of commune, that out of the dread disorder, felt or feigned, it may find the opportunity to retain, strengthen, and consolidate the power it has usurped. Disguise it as we may, this one great truth is indisputable: the man who holds the Presidency of the United States against the will of the people, clearly expressed according to law, is as surely a monarch as he who by birth or force holds a throne, sways a scepter, or wears a crown. Republicans may fret and democrats may fawn, but so long as the usurper holds his power he is master and they are slaves.

By whatever name history may describe the electoral commission, its birth, life, and death, the motives, conduct, and benefits which governed, characterized, or attached to the actors and beneficiary of that most solemn farce, it will forever debate whether submission to its finding was the result of the most heroic patriotism or of the most abject cowardice the world has ever seen. This one fact, however, it will never deny. The silent soldier who commanded the standing Army riveted the chains which the people drag along in lengthening disgrace.

I know we cannot hope to do more now than to assist at the reduction of the Army, and, at the passage of the amendment I offer, to restrain the Army so that it may not be used as a posse comitatus without even the color of law. I trust, however, at the next session we may obviate all necessity for any but a very small standing Army by the passage of a law to organize, arm, and discipline the militia to be used to execute the laws of the Union and suppress insurrection as was intended by "our fathers who framed the Constitution."

Men of New England, the history of whose fathers glows bright with the love of liberty, ye who are next of kin to James Otis and Samuel Adams, and the rightful inheritors of their immortal renown, hearken to the echo of the mighty past:

Standing armies are dangerous to liberty and ought not to be maintained.

I offer the following amendment:

Provided, That from and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful to use any part of the land or naval forces of the United States to execute the laws either as a posse comitatus or otherwise, except in such cases as may be expressly authorized by act of Congress.

Before the conclusion of Mr. KIMMEL'S remarks his hour expired and the hammer fell.

Mr. HUMPHREY obtained the floor.

Mr. BANNING. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Maryland be extended.

Mr. FOSTER. I dislike very much to object, but the arrangements are such that if the gentleman's time is extended other gentlemen will be precluded from an opportunity to address the committee.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I must object.

Mr. SINGLETON. There is but half an hour remaining before the business of the District of Columbia will come up, and the gentleman from Maryland might as well be allowed to occupy that time.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I hope there will be no objection to the extension of the time of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. KIMMEL. I want only ten minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I cannot yield from the fact that the District of Columbia business comes up at two o'clock, and I have only this half hour in which I can speak.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HUMPHREY] has a right to speak in the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SMITH,] and this is the only time under the rules that he will be entitled to speak, and if he yields the floor now there will be no time which the Chair can assign to him for debate upon this bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to have to take from the gentleman from Maryland any time that he desires upon this question. If I had been in a position to make my remarks without giving them in an extemporaneous manner I should have gladly yielded to him; but it is understood that there are very few of us who get an opportunity to speak upon these bills and upon questions that come before the House unless we do it at an opportune moment; and as I have had no opportunity to put in writing what I desired to say in the short time I have, I am obliged to occupy that time which is conceded to me.

It is not my desire, Mr. Chairman, to antagonize in any manner the bill that has been presented to the committee. It has many features that are exceedingly in advance of the law as it stands at present. There are many excellent features connected with the bill; but I desire, before proceeding further, to meet an idea that has been so often advanced upon the floor of this House, that a standing army is a menace to the liberties of the people.

I desire for a few moments to call the attention of the House to the time when the first standing army sprung into existence, and the causes and the reasons given in the history of the time for that which resulted in the Old World in having what is now understood to be a standing army. It is a well known matter of history that the first standing army recognized by any law in England was in the commencement of the reign of William and Mary.

It is also a well known fact of history, that prior to that time the very small standing army which was organized in the time of Charles I was never recognized as a standing army, but was nothing more than the trained bands or militia of the nation; and after the revolution of 1745, when an attempt was made and carried into effect to organize a national militia, the popularity of that measure, brought forward by the statesmen at that time, was exceedingly great; but they lived to see the day when the national militia fell into ridicule, and a standing army became the rule in England.

I desire now to call attention to why this was. Before the time of the restoration, before the time of the revolution, long back to the days of Henry V, when the feudal tenure existed in England, there could have been no such thing as a standing army. The tenant in capite, or the lord of the fief, owed vassalage and service to the monarch, and was called upon to furnish a quota of men. When thus called out he could not be compelled to leave the country nor to remain in the service more than ninety days at one time, so that unless the tenant in capite or lord of the fief was in unison with the spirit of the monarchy, which was absolute at that time I may say, there could be no rule of action by which the king himself could bring about that state of things which would lead to the establishment of an army. No such thing as a standing army was known; and why? Because under the feudal tenure it could not exist.

We come down now to the time when all such service was commuted to the Crown, and when troops were put in action by the Crown by means of commutation made by the tenant in capite or the owner of the fief who owed service to the lord or service to the Crown. And when that service came to be commuted, then was the first idea entertained that a standing army could be maintained in place of those trained bands, in place of that vassalage which the vassal owed to the tenant in capite or the owner of the fief which he owed to the monarch. Then the idea of a standing army sprang into existence, because the old service was commuted by the payment of money, which was used for the purpose of supplying the army with its regiments and battalions.

We now come down to the time to which I referred a few moments since, when Charles I raised the seven thousand men, and when it was said, as it is to-day, that a standing army was a menace to the liberties of the country. Mind you, Mr. Chairman, I do not stand here to-day to argue that a standing army must necessarily exist for the purpose of protecting our liberties; I am not here to urge that. I am here simply to withstand the idea that even in the case of a constitutional monarchy a standing army is necessarily a menace to the liberties of any people.

I desire to call attention to the difference between those times and the present. When the standing army was first organized in England, which is provided for in the mutiny bill passed yearly by the commons, providing that no man shall be court-martialed unless the mutiny bill should be passed annually and until the passage of the bill, no man who committed a crime in the military service could be punished except by civil power. They have passed that bill every year, and appropriations for the army are made every year. This provision of the British constitution we have taken for our model, making appropriations for the Army every year. When such was the rule of action in England the danger had passed, if there ever was any, arising from a standing army under a constitutional monarchy; for the history of England since that day shows conclusively that under her constitution the largest liberty and pure freedom are compatible with the existence of a standing army.

The national militia, as it was called, and which it was supposed would bring about a state of things in England that would save the necessity of a standing army—the national militia fell into disuse, for the very reason which we saw in this country last summer, when it was found that the militia was not fitted to take the place of the regular troops. Those who form the national militia are born and live among those with whom they are to contend; they are organized for certain purposes in case of emergency. They never are in such a position that they can have the drill, the experience, and the training which will fit them, when the emergency arises in the history of the nation, to withstand the onset required of them, when they had to fight on the continent under the banner of William or the Duke of Marlborough. For, adverting to the difficulties of last summer, it was then clearly proven that regular troops were much more effectual, and their duties more respected, than the State militia. They knew no country except the Union of these States; they fought under no flag but the "Stars and Stripes." No State boundaries constrained them, or limited their duties. They were soldiers of the Republic, and nobly sustained their reputation as such.

Recurring to British history, as the prerogatives of the Crown were yielded by William and Mary a standing army sprung into existence which had certain limits recognized by the constitution of England as that constitution was perfected during the reign of William. From that day to this England has stood first as a nation of prosperity, a nation that has supported a standing army from 1688 until to-day, and which has never in any instance found occasion to fear that her standing army would forswear its allegiance to the country or the Crown.

The trouble is we forget that England the moment she began to assume that shape under her constitution which she has at present, the moment that her institutions became molded into permanent form, the moment there was such a change in the constitution and manners of her people—because her constitution was written in the hearts and the lives of the people—that moment the change in her constitution led England to stand forth as a nation whose liberties were guarded by her Magna Charta and were not to be trenched upon in any case by any danger that could arise from a standing army.

It may be answered that France, in her great system of national militia, for the last three centuries has presented a case where a national militia in the hour of difficulty and emergency was able to withstand the onset of a foreign or a domestic foe. But I would call your attention to the fact that in France the monarchy was absolute; and where a monarchy is absolute and the militia is under the eye and guidance of the emperor, whose power and whose word is law, it may well be that in such case a national militia for the national defense might have its power and its strength uncrippled through all ages.

But how is it in the case of a constitutional monarchy or of a republic? Take, for instance, our own land. We have, as has been stated by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. KIMMEL,] provided in our Constitution that no appropriation shall be made for a standing army except at stated times, as therein enumerated. We have made provisions in our Constitution as stringent as those in the constitution of England; so that at all times, except in one emergency, the standing army is in subordination to the civil power. And if in that emergency the civil power stands aside for the military power experience has shown that in a country like ours there is no danger. Experience has shown that when our citizen soldiery shouldered their knapsacks and took their muskets in hand and came to the front they lost none of their patriotism, none of their allegiance and fidelity to the Government, which they had when they enlisted; because it was patriotism and love of country and love of law and order that induced them to throw aside their hoe, their plow, and their pursuits of civil life and shoulder the knapsack and step forward in the defense of their country.

In 1868 what was the footing of the Pentarchy on the continent? France had 1,200,000 men, and this was in time of peace. Austria had 800,000 men; Italy, 500,000; Russia, nearly 1,000,000; Prussia, about 1,000,000. Thus we see that in time of peace here were nearly 5,000,000 men in the military service under the Pentarchy in Europe, saying nothing about the 300,000 men that England at that time had in her regular army.

I do not bring forward these considerations as any reason why we should augment our Army. It was at that time a fact, (and as Motley says no epigram could be terser than the fact,) it was in 1868 a fact that the United States had an Army of but 40,000 men, while that European Pentarchy had nearly 5,000,000. Could there be a greater contrast between monarchical and republican institutions? Our Republic, with this small military force, had a border extending thousands of miles, that border infested by savages, liable at any time to break forth into a state of war. But with us, relying upon the intelligence and virtue of our people, an Army of 40,000 men sufficed. It is upon popular intelligence and political virtue that we must ever rely, for when these die out in a republic nothing is left to take their place. So long as the citizen of the Republic feels within his breast the love of country and the determination to do his duty honestly and fearlessly, we need never apprehend that an Army of 30,000 or 40,000 men is dangerous to our liberties.

Why, Mr. Chairman, during the last year we had a standing Army of twenty thousand or twenty-five thousand men. During a part of the year this Army was without any appropriations for its support.

If there was ever a time when we might expect the men and officers of our Army to show insubordination or want of patriotism it was then when proper appropriations had not been made for their support, and when they were called upon to travel from the Rocky Mountains to the cities of the East and the West to protect property and life from violence during the "strikes." But no truer patriotism, no stronger love of country, no sweeter incense upon the shrine of liberty was ever poured out than during that time when the soldiers' certificates for their pay had to be cashed by Drexel & Co., the soldiers paying the interest thereon because the Government had failed to make the necessary appropriations. Though their necessities had to be provided for in this irregular and uncertain way they stood their ground bravely, nobly, and did not even murmur.

To determine the question whether a standing army such as any we are likely to have in this country is dangerous to our liberties, we have only to address the question to our own hearts. All of us have friends, many of us have relatives in the Army, and we have only to ask ourselves this question: if we were called upon to-day to leave civil life and take part in repelling any foreign foe, would not our love of country be as strong, would not our hearts in that hour of national trial beat in unison with the demands of our country just as much as if we were in civil life?

Why, sir, the republic that existed longest in history was the Republic of Sparta, which endured eight hundred years; yet no such thing as constitutional monarchy or anything else than civil rule obtained in those times. The German historian informs us that when at the close of the Roman republic the German youth who had been brought under subjection by the Romans entered Rome (and at that time the Roman civil law obtained all over the continent of Europe) they saw meanness by the side of avarice; they saw nothing to attract the eye of a man who loved liberty in his native home. This was one reason why Germany threw off the yoke and regained her liberties, detaching herself from that empire. It was because Rome had lost her political virtue; because she had nothing left except her army, and that had become corrupt for the reason that no love of country could survive in any people who had become the slaves of absolute power which had been fastened upon them.

Turn to France in her early days; and in this connection I desire to meet the argument of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KIMMEL] who states that a standing army must inevitably be a menace to the liberties of any country. Take a rapid glance at the history of France from the eighth to the fourteenth or fifteenth century. The feudal tenure had been fastened upon France, as it then prevailed in Germany and in Italy. But that system did not extend to Spain. It is a remarkable fact that Spain in the eighth century had greater freedom than she has in the nineteenth. In the eighth century Spain stood forth as a nation in which the freedom of every man was kept intact by that power which gentleness and truth will always give. Spain, before the invasion of the Moors, had a military and a civil government fully constituted and her liberties were better guarded than those of any other nation on the face of Europe.

I now call particular attention to France, when the Dukes of Burgundy were at the height of their power and figured brilliantly upon the page of history. When those dukes were called upon by the king to aid in suppressing insurrection or to resist the invasion of a foreign foe, Burgundy stood like any separate State of this Union; the army of the dukes, if you please, was like the militia of the States, and the dukes yielded to the demand of the king or not, just as it suited them, for their power was such that they could even resist the monarch of France. In one instance, which all will remember, the Duke of Burgundy sided even with the King of England against the King of France. We read that on the banks of the Rhine a Duke of Anjou plucked the plant which gave the name of Plantagenet to the holders of the English crown; and long the royal house of England bearing that name shed a luster over the English monarchy by the brightness of its coming. I say that in that day and generation the French monarchy was powerless by reason of these fiefs held by the powerful Dukes of Burgundy and Anjou, held from the French crown, but in reality at times more powerful than the crown itself, for they refused to yield to the demand of the king to join in the war against his enemies. I speak of this to show in that day and in that time there was no love of union, no love of country; there was consequently no power which was able to cement the nation irresistibly against its enemies foreign or domestic. It was through the disintegration of the Empire of France, because of the defection of the Dukes of Burgundy and others, that England was able to secure unquestioned grasp of power over France and elsewhere throughout Europe for so many centuries.

My argument, Mr. Chairman, is that in a country like this, a Union composed of sovereign States, the power of the General Government being defined by the Federal Constitution—I say, and say it respectfully, in answer to the objections of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. KIMMEL,] that if our Constitution contemplated anything it contemplated a standing Army; because one, in fact, existed under the articles of confederation. We had the common law of England as our guide. We had heard and seen the efforts of Walpole, Pitt, and the great men of that day to bring the finance into proper order and condition, and we had beheld the power to which England in consequence had risen. We had all that light shed upon us at the time our Constitution was framed by the fathers. We had the whole example of England before us, and we had seen she had a standing army from 1688 to the very hour in which our Constitution was framed. Our Constitution was framed exactly with a view of providing for a standing army, so that the General Government should not be compelled to depend altogether at all times and in all emergencies upon State militia alone. We have recognized that fact for the last century. We have never yet seen any evil to flow from it. We have never yet known the liberty of a single citizen invaded by it. And let me say, Mr. Chairman, that I would rather have our liberties to-day protected upon the deck of an American ship with the old flag floating over it, even though the citizen whose rights were to be protected had merely declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, I would rather risk them upon an American ship, under the American flag, commanded by an American officer, than in any State of the United States; because the General Government has shown when the rights of an American citizen were threatened it would put forth its entire power to protect them at every hazard. It can never be forgotten that such was the course pursued in the case of Louis Koszta, who, although he had merely declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, was, by the exhibition of the power and energy of an officer of the Government, freed from a prison-hold in the Adriatic and restored to all his rights.

I am in favor, therefore, of granting to the General Government whatever share of power may be necessary. I am not afraid of a certain degree of centralization being accorded to the General Government. I am not afraid of granting to it the regulation of suffrage or of national banking, or indeed any power necessary for the maintenance of a strong and successful Government. The sovereignty of the States will not be lessened, but on the contrary the people will rise to bless and not to curse. I say that it is just as much the duty of the Government to provide and care for the people of the country as it is the duty of a father to preserve, protect, and care for his children. If a father brings up his children in idleness he must expect nothing but "tramps," he must expect nothing but to fill the penitentiaries; and if this Government shall pursue the same policy, if it shall not provide labor for its citizens, if it shall not see to it that the wants of the millions who are crying for bread to-day and who are willing to work are supplied by giving them employment, it must expect the sad results which most inevitably follow. It must expect that if it sows to the wind it must reap the whirlwind, and that consequently "tramps" will infest the country, idleness will beget crime, and the Government will but reap the necessary result of those crimes for which it is in a certain degree responsible.

Other nations recognize this principle. Germany educates her citizens for war and for peace. She sees to it that her youth imbibe habits of industry, are trained in the schools to perform intelligently the duties which she expects them to assume on reaching manhood, in middle age, and to the end of life. And she is not ashamed to copy from any nation, be it a monarchy or a republic, any principle or idea which will add to her social order, to the well being of her people, to redound to the honor and the glory of a united Germany. Consequently she is constantly, since her unification and the formation of her parliament, copying from the rules and modes of procedure of our American Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I have called attention to these historical facts for the purpose of showing that one of our dangers may be that in guarding too closely the rights of the States, as distinguished from the rights of the central Government, and by too narrow a construction of our Constitution we may fasten upon ourselves as a Republic, a modern feudalism more dangerous to the people of these United States than any benefit that can possibly flow to the individual citizen of a State. If we insist upon reducing our Army until in fact nothing shall remain but the militia in the States, we shall then have placed ourselves in the position of claiming to exist as a Union of States with no central power to exert itself when the whole of this Republic shall be menaced by a foreign foe. It is true we are now only looking for quietness on our borders; but one of the great States of this Union is constantly in a condition of ferment to-day, her citizens in fear, with nothing at hand to stay an invasion daily apprehended on her borders; and in the face of the fact that the pioneers of Texas are constantly menaced, we are contemplating a reduction of our Army.

As I have said, there are many good features in the bill brought forward; but in my judgment, in view of what I have just stated, and the extent of our borders, our Army should be kept on a footing of at least thirty thousand men. In fact, Mr. Chairman, I would utilize as far as possible in the present depressed state of the country all the idle, unskilled labor of the country. I would repair our posts and our fortifications wherever needed. I would favor the carrying on of a system of public works in addition, to utilize the skilled labor of the country, and thus provide bread for the hungry and clothing for the needy. I would make the waste places to rejoice, and the wilderness to blossom as the rose. It is economy, Mr. Chairman, in this Government or any government to do this, and thus prevent a repetition of those disgraceful outbreaks which not only menace the peace of the whole country but foster a feeling alien to the Government and to the prosperity of the nation.

The spirit of our laws, the spirit of our Constitution, and the spirit of our civilization, which is a civilization peculiarly American in its character, would dictate that at this day and age, when the mind of this country is struggling for supremacy in popular education, in general intelligence, and in inventive genius, we should not allow ourselves to be drawn away from the grand destiny which awaits us in the dim distance, if not in the near future. For certain it is that if the spirit of the laws is any indication of the march of a people, we must fully realize the fact that for social order and the means of life being easily produced, this Republic furnishes an instance without parallel of a nation that can cultivate the arts of war and the arts of peace, without the slightest menace or danger to the liberties of the Republic.

In fact of all the petitions that have been placed before the present Congress not one has been found asking for a reduction of the Army. On the contrary within the last year more than one "sovereign State" has called for help, has petitioned the central Government for regular troops because she was unable to restrain domestic violence within her borders. Even "Maryland, my Maryland," within the last year, has sent frantic dispatches invoking the national power to repress that unwonted enthusiasm resulting from the very causes I have been detailing. While so many petitions are being laid before both Houses of Congress asking for relief by an amelioration of the condition of the masses asking for succor, setting forth the dangers that menace us and the evil that lies before us, while not one petition has been laid before either House intimating that our standing Army is endangering the rights and libertics of the people, or that the people are suffering or will suffer, or can suffer from an Army of even forty thousand men, why not then let well enough alone and turn our attention to those petitions which lie before us, and give, so far as we can do so under the Constitution and the laws, that aid and succor to the people which shall take distress from their minds and famine from their doors?

Mr. SINGLETON obtained the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that according to order the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 4867) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the Chair recognizes the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia.

REFUND OF TAXES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 933) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to refund certain taxes erroneously collected, and for other purposes.

The bill was read. It authorizes and empowers the commissioners of the District of Columbia to refund to any persons who have heretofore been erroneously assessed for special improvement taxes on property not belonging to them, such moneys as they shall be found to have paid as taxes upon such erroneous assessment; and the said commissioners are empowered to correct any assessment so found to have been made, and collect the tax from the rightful owners of the property.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. If no member desires an explanation of the bill I will ask the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLUMBIAN COLLEGE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, also, from the same committee, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 4713) supplementary to the act of February 9, 1821, incorporating Columbian College, District of Columbia, &c.

The bill was read. It so modifies the act of March 3, 1873, ratifying and confirming the act for the relief of the Columbian College in the District of Columbia, enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the said District, and approved July 25, 1871, as to authorize the trustees and overseers of the Columbian University to hold their annual meeting on such day in May or June preceding the annual commencement of the college and the other schools of the university as the said trustees and overseers shall appoint, instead of being held on the Tuesday next preceding the last Wednesday in that month.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "June," in line 10, to and including the word "university," in line 11.

Strike out the words "that month," and insert in place thereof the word "June," in line 14.

Amend the title so that it shall read:

Supplementary to the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act supplemental to the act of February 9, 1821, incorporating Columbian College, District of Columbia."

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendments were adopted; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SALE OF COAL AND BUILDING REGULATIONS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4943) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to make and enforce regulations relative to the sale of coal, and also building regulations; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the commissioners of the District of Columbia to make and enforce such rules and regulations relative to the sale of coal in the District of Columbia as shall insure full weight to purchasers of coal, also such building regulations for the said District of Columbia as they may deem advisable.

The bill, in its second section, enacts that such rules and regulations made as above provided shall have the same force and effect within the District of Columbia as if enacted by Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. There have been many complaints in the District as to the light weight of coal delivered by dealers. The commissioners desire authority to make regulations relative to the sale of that article. They recommend also that they have authority to make regulations in regard to building. They make them now, but they do not have the force of law.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The persons hereinbefore named, or a majority of them, shall, within ten days after the approval of this act, open books and receive subscriptions for such capital stock at such time or times and place or places as they shall deem proper; and may appoint persons to superintend the receiving of subscriptions and to receive money payable thereon; may call a meeting of subscribers at such time and place and with such notice as they shall deem proper, af er the minimum amount of capital aforesaid shall be subscribed; and may do all other acts necessary and proper to constitute and organize the said corporation until the first board of directors shall be elected, including the power in person, or through persons appointed by them, or a majority of them, to superintend, conduct, and certify that election.

SEC. 4. That at the meeting of subscribers to be called as aforesaid, or at any meeting called by adjournment thereof from time to time, there shall be elected a board of five directors; and from the time of such election the said corporation shall be completely organized and constituted, with all the faculties, rights, and privileges which lawfully belong to corporations generally, so far as the same shall be necessary for the purposes of its incorporation, including perpetual succession; the right to have and use a common seal, and to change the same at pleasure; the power to purchase, receive, acquire, hold, lease, dispose of, and manage real estate in the District of Columbia outside the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown not exceeding two hundred acres, and personal property not exceeding $200,000 in value; the right to sue and be sued, and to transact its business in the said corporate name; the power to appoint officers, agents, and servants; the power to make contracts, and to make all by-laws, rules, and regulations which may be deemed expedient and not contrary to law; and to prescribe the sources from which revenue may be derived, not inconsistent with law. A majority of said board shall be a quorum, and all shall be stockholders of the corporation. They shall elect one of their number president and another vice-president, and a secretary, whose terms of office shall be the same as the board of directors. The board may call a general meeting of the stockholders at any time, or the same may be done by persons holding one-third of the stock of the corporation, and any officer of the corporation may be removed on vote of a majority of the stock thereof represented at such meeting, and his successor elected to fill his place. One week's notice in some newspaper of general circulation in said District shall be required to call said meeting.

SEC. 5. That the said shares of stock shall be personal property to all intents. Certificates thereof may be issued in such form as the board of directors may prescribe, and may be transferred in such manner as the by-laws may prescribe, but no share shall be transferred until all calls or assessments previously made thereon shall have been paid up. There shall be paid on each share of stock not less than $5 at the time of subscribing, and the residue shall be paid from time to time when-over assessed or called for by the board of directors. Upon default in the payment of any sum due on any subscription, the stock may be forfeited and sold for the payment thereof, with interest and expenses, under such regulations as the by-laws may prescribe, or the corporation may, by suit, recover the same from the holder of the stock at the time of the assessment thereof, or at any subsequent time.

SEC. 6. That this act may be amended or repealed at any time, and shall take effect from the date of its approval.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLACKBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. BLACKBURN, from the same committee, reported back, with adverse recommendations, bills of the following titles; and the same were laid upon the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

The bill (H. R. No. 2344) to provide for the conveyance of the low grounds in the city of Washington under the provisions of the act of Congress approved May 7, 1872; and

The bill (H. R. No. 3697) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to purchase the Seaton House.

PENNY-LUNCH HOUSE.

Mr. BLACKBURN also, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 182) for the benefit of the penny-lunch house of the city of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read. It appropriates the sum of $1,500 for the benefit of the penny-lunch house in the city of Washington, and authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the said sum of money to George Riggs, of Washington, District of Columbia, to be by him, the said Riggs, paid over to Mrs. Julia A. Roberts, of said city of Washington, in sums not exceeding $100 in any one month, for the maintenance of said lunch house.

Mr. BLACKBURN. This joint resolution proposes an appropriation of $1,500 in aid of the charity designated in the resolution, which has been established and in operation here in the city of Washington during the past winter and spring. I apprehend that there will be no objection to the passage of the joint resolution, and I therefore ask a vote.

The question was on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether this is money which has already been expended.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will state in answer to the gentleman from Missouri that it is not. This charity has not been aided by the Government in any way. It has been conducted altogether by contributions made for its support by private citizens.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I ask the gentleman if this joint resolution is for the purpose of carrying on further this system of liberality toward the poor.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is the purpose; and the gentleman from Missouri by reading the joint resolution will see that it is properly guarded; that it requires this money shall be paid out in sums of not more than $100 per month; and that the depository named in the resolution is the banking-house of Mr. Riggs.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. On whose order is the money to be paid?

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is to be paid upon the requisition of the lady who originated the institution and has successfully conducted it without assistance, except from private persons, to the infinite relief of the suffering classes of Washington City for the last six months; and I may say in addition that it has tended to decrease the amount of beggary in the city.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLACKBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERFECTION OF TITLE TO REAL ESTATE.

Mr. HUNTON, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2915) to perfect the title to certain real estate in the District of Columbia, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read. It provides that the United States hereby quitclaim and release, in favor of George W. Watson, his heirs and assigns, any and all claim or title which they, the United States, have in or to lot No. 8, and the north thirty-four feet of lot No. 7, in square No. 996, situate in the city of Washington, District of Columbia; and that the United States hereby quitclaim and release, in favor of William H. Tyler, his heirs and assigns, any and all claim or title which they, the United States, have in or to the south thirteen feet of lot No. 7, in square No. 996, situate in the city of Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. HUNTON. I would like to say in explanation of the bill that it was referred to the commissioners of the District of Columbia for a report, and through their attorney they make the following report:

Watson makes an equally clear case. A purchase of the lots described was made of the commissioners of the public grounds, paid for, and the party went into possession and so remained ever since, paid taxes and improved; would have a perfect title by prescription against any person but the United States. This case is full of merit.

It seems from this report that the commissioners of public grounds sold this lot to the parties named in the bill. They paid for it and took possession of it, but they neglected to get a title and the object of the bill is to give them a quitclaim title from the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF JUSTICES, ETC., FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HUNTON, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3969) regulating the appointment of justices of the peace, commissioners of deeds, and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, with a recommendation that sundry amendments of the Senate be concurred in and sundry other amendments be non-concurred in.

The report of the Committee for the District of Columbia was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which certain amendments of the Senate were concurred in and certain other amendments were non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON. I move that a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill be appointed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 314) to confirm the term, for a period of seventeen years from the date of its original grant, of the patent of Thomas A. Weston.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 77) to provide the times and places of holding the circuit courts of the United States of the district of Iowa and the appointment of an additional judge in said district; and

A bill (S. No. 1184) to amend the one hundred and third article of war.

CAPITOL, NORTH O STREET, AND SOUTH WASHINGTON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. HENDEE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1537, a bill (H. R. No. 4944) amendatory of an act to incorporate the Capitol, North O Street, and South Washington Railway Company; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the act to incorporate the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company, approved March 3, 1875, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize said company to lay a single or double track and run its cars from its present line on E and Eleventh streets, northwest, eastward on E street to Tenth street, thence south on Tenth street to D street, thence eastward on D street to Eighth street, thence south on Eighth street to Market Space, thence eastward on said Market Space to Seventh street, thence across Seventh street and the intervening public space to Louisiana avenue, thence eastward on Louisiana and Indiana avenues, to connect with the tracks of said company on First street; also to construct a single or double track as a branch of its present line, from a point on Boundary street adjacent to what is known as Saint Patrick's Cemetery, along the valley east of Howard University, to the southern boundary of Soldiers' Home, near to Harewood entrance.

SEC. 2. That said company shall complete the track and run its cars along the streets and spaces first named, without additional fare, within eighteen months; and complete the branch last named, and run cars thereon, during such time and at such intervals as they may deem expedient within two years; and for riding over this branch or extension of the road the company may charge an additional fare not exceeding five cents: And provided, That the tracks shall be laid along said streets and avenues and spaces where the commissioners of the District shall direct: And provided, That said company shall be subject to all the restrictions and requirements in the construction required and the operation of the additional road hereby authorized set forth in the original charter of said company, except as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. HENDEE. I call the previous question upon the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SEC. 17. That all acts or parts of acts now in force in the District of Columbia inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONVICTS SENTENCED TO HARD LABOR.

Mr. CLAFLIN also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 4805) to provide that persons sentenced to hard labor by the courts of the District may be confined in the jail in said District, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SEWERAGE OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. MAYHAM, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 4785) for the improvement of the sewerage of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

OUTSTANDING CLAIMS AGAINST THE DISTRICT.

Mr. MAYHAM also, from the same committee, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 4810) to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes.

Mr. EDEN. I make the point of order that this bill makes an appropriation from the Treasury and must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope that will be done.

Mr. MAYHAM. The amendments proposed to the bill by the committee will remove the objection raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN.] It is true that this bill provides for the payment in the first instance of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims by the Treasury of the United States, but it also provides that the Treasury shall be reimbursed out of any funds in the Treasury belonging to the District.

Mr. EDEN. I have not seen the amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is in the power of the House at the present time, on motion, to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COX, of New York. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to, upon a division—ayes 45, noes 7; no further count being called for.

NEUFCHÂTEL ROCK PAVING COMPANY.

Mr. HENKLE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported adversely House bill No. 1942, for the relief of the North American Neufchâtel Rock Paving Company, and House bill No. 3260, for the relief of the Neufchâtel Rock Paving Company; and the same were laid upon the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD.

Mr. DAVIS, of California, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 4069) requiring the removal of the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad from certain streets in the city of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] to the understanding had in committee that this bill was not to be reported until all the rest of the business of the committee was disposed of.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a matter of agreement in committee over which the Chair has no authority.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I was not aware that there was such an understanding in the committee. If that is the case I will withdraw the bill until the other business of the committee has been brought before the House.

The bill was accordingly withdrawn.

RECORDER OF DEEDS AND REGISTER OF WILLS.

Mr. BRENTANO, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 4734, to amend chapter 15 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, and House bill No. 4828, to amend chapter 27 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, a bill (H. R. No. 4946) to amend chapters 15 and 27 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, and to consolidate into one the offices of recorder of deeds and register of wills of said District; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the offices of recorder of deeds and register of wills, as provided for in sections 467 and 929 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, be, and are hereby, consolidated into one, and that the incumbent of said office shall be known as the recorder of deeds and register of wills of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. Said recorder of deeds and register of wills shall have charge and custody of all the records, papers, and property pertaining to both of said offices therein consolidated, and shall perform all the duties now required by law of said recorder of deeds and register of wills respectively, with all the powers and privileges pertaining to said offices according to law. He shall be appointed by the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and before entering upon the duties of his office shall take an oath that he will faithfully and impartially perform the same according to law; and shall give a bond to the United States, with two or more sureties to be approved by the chief-justice of the supreme court of the District, in the sum of $25,000, faithfully to discharge the duties of his office and to record all deeds and other instruments in writing authorized to be recorded according to law, also the decrees and orders of the justices of the supreme court holding the special term for the orphan's court business for the District, and all wills proved before him or the court, and all other matters directed to be recorded in the court or in the office of register, or required by them to be there recorded; and to make returns quarterly into the treasury of the District of all fees which may have been collected by him, or which may have come into his hands during the preceding three months, which bond shall be entered in full upon the minutes of the court and the original filed with the records thereof.

SEC. 3. The recorder of deeds and register of wills herein provided for shall be a citizen of the United States and shall have been a bona fide resident of said District for at least three years previous to his appointment. He shall be considered a subordinate officer of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and shall be responsible to said court for his official acts, and for good cause shown shall be subject to removal from office by the said supreme court of the District.

SEC. 4. The recorder of deeds and register of wills shall hold his office for four years and until his successor is appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by an order of the supreme court of the District of Columbia as hereinbefore provided for. He shall be entitled to a salary of $3,500 per annum. He shall make quarterly returns supported by his oath of all the fees received in accordance with sections 470 and 931 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia to the chief justice of the supreme court of the District; and all fees so received by him during the three months preceding in excess of one-fourth of his annual salary and the expenses for clerk hire and disbursements for blank books, stationery, and postage-stamps as herein provided, he shall at the time of making such report pay into the Treasury of the District.

SEC. 5. The recorder of deeds and register of wills of said District shall have power to appoint deputies of like powers and privileges with himself, and for whose official conduct he shall be responsible. He shall receive such deputy and clerk hire as the supreme court of the District shall allow and as he shall necessarily expend, together with the necessary disbursement for blank books, stationery, and postage-stamps.

SEC. 6. Immediately after the passage of this act the offices of recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia and of register of wills of said District shall be deemed vacant: Provided, however, That the present incumbents shall perform the duties of the said offices respectively, and receive the fees for their services as provided by sections 470 and 931 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, till their successor is appointed and qualified.

SEC. 7. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. DUNNELL. Is this a unanimous report from the Committee for the District of Columbia?

Mr. BRENTANO. It is.

Mr. DUNNELL. How is the recorder of deeds now appointed?

Mr. BRENTANO. By the President.

The question being taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, there were—ayes 24, noes 14; no quorum voting.

Mr. PAGE. This is an important bill. I think there ought to be a quorum voting upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted, the Chair orders tellers and appoints the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRENTANO] and the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL.]

Mr. DUNNELL. There has been no explanation from the committee as to the necessity for this measure.

Mr. HANNA. I ask that the bill be again read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill, which is a long one, has already been read once.

Mr. PAGE. Has the bill ever been printed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill now under consideration is a substitute for two other bills which were referred to the committee. Its comes regularly before the House.

Mr. HUNTON. If the House will indulge me a moment I will give an explanation of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can only be done by unanimous consent as the House is dividing. As very little attention seems to have been paid to the bill when first read, it will, if there is no objection, be read again as requested by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HANNA.]

The bill was again read.

Mr. DUNNELL. I make the point that this bill should be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is too late in raising that point. The bill is now before the House; and the question is on ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time, on which question the Chair has ordered tellers, pending which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] rises to make some explanation of the measure. The Chair will hear the gentleman if there is no objection.

Mr. HUNTON. I only need say a word or two in explanation of the bill. There is now in the District of Columbia an officer called the recorder of deeds, whose salary and fees, as we are informed in the committee, amount to more than $10,000 a year. There is also an officer called the register of wills, who is entitled to all the fees of his office, which we are informed amount to more than $10,000 annually. The committee believed that these two offices might be consolidated and the duties discharged by a single officer, whose annual salary is fixed by the bill at $3,500, and who is authorized to employ clerks to assist him. We believed that if this consolidation should be made, these two offices would be as well conducted as at present, while there would be a saving to the District of Columbia of $15,000 or $16,000 a year.

Mr. DUNNELL. Why has it been considered necessary to change the appointing power? The recorder of deeds is now appointed by the President. A gentleman has recently been appointed to that position and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. HUNTON. I presume that this is a matter about which the committee would not be very strenuous, but the gentleman will recollect that our committee all through the present Congress have taken the ground that appointments of District officers ought not to be made by the President of the United States; that these merely municipal officers, discharging duties in which only the people of the District are interested, ought to be under the control and subject to the appointment of the District authorities.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman consent to an amendment striking out the words "chief-justice of the supreme court of the District" and inserting "the President of the United States?"

Mr. HUNTON. No, sir; I will not accept the amendment. In the first place, I am not authorized by the committee to do so, and, in the next place, we believe that, as these are officers of the court, the court ought to have the power of appointment as well as removal, as provided for in the bill.

Mr. HANNA. What has that court to do with the recording of deeds of parties in this District?

Mr. HUNTON. All questions as to the proper recordation of deeds come before this court; and, as to wills, all questions of probate come before it.

Mr. HANNA. A question as to the recording of a deed could not possibly come before the court except in some special case where the question of authentication might arise.

Mr. HUNTON. And in such cases that very question comes before this court.

Mr. KELLEY. It could only come before the court in an action for failure to make a proper record.

Mr. HUNTON. I think that is true.

Mr. KELLEY. And that would be only an incident to general litigation. That court can have no special supervision over the recorder of deeds in any way; and I do not see why the power of appointment should not as well be given to any other officer of the District as to the judge of that court.

Mr. HUNTON. The gentleman will recollect that the bill provides for the appointment not only of a recorder of deeds, but also of a register of wills; and the latter officer records the opinions of the probate court. To this extent he is the servant and officer of the court.

Mr. KELLEY. I have not studied the judicial system of this District; but I do not see how the chief-justice of the supreme court of the District has any special relation to the office of register of wills.

In the case of a question arising on a will it may get before the justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, but certainly on no original jurisdiction. The chief-justice of the supreme court of this District is not a probate judge. It had better be given, therefore, to the probate judge, whoever he may be, and then there would be some relation between the office and the thing the officer is to do. There is none between the chief-justice and this officer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not inclined to indulge this debate longer, as it is not in order during a division of the House. Before the House proceeds further the Chair desires to know exactly the situation of the bill. Has the gentleman from Illinois demanded the previous question?

Mr. BRENTANO. I did not demand it, but I will demand it now.

Mr. DUNNELL. I rise to move an amendment to the bill, as I understand the substitute is before the House as an original bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Illinois did not demand the previous question on the bill, the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota is clearly in order if offered before the House divided. The Chair desires to protect the rights of all parties. If the amendment was offered before the division the gentleman from Minnesota does not require unanimous consent to offer his amendment. Objection, however, is made that the House is dividing.

Mr. REAGAN. I should like to ask why this is made a salaried officer, instead of being paid by fees. If this salary is to be paid by the Government, what then is to become of the fees?

Mr. HUNTON. They are to be paid into the Treasury and the salary is to be paid out of the fees.

Mr. DUNNELL. I did not suggest my amendment until after the House was dividing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question before the House, then, is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time. As there was no quorum on the last vote, the Chair appoints Mr. BRENTANO and Mr. DUNNELL tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 74.

So the House refused to order the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is now open to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to strike out the words "chief-justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia" and in lieu thereof to insert "the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. BRENTANO. While the gentleman from Minnesota is reducing his amendment to writing, I wish merely to say a word. This is nothing but an office properly belonging to the court in this District. In no State of the Union is the recorder of deeds appointed by the governor, but everywhere it is considered a local office and the recorder is elected by the people of the county in which he acts. Therefore, to place the appointing power in a court of this District is entirely in accord with the constitutional provision—article 2, section 2—which says:

> But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

The recorder of deeds and register of wills are by this bill consolidated, and the officer is declared to be subordinate to the court of the District. He is responsible to the court, and therefore ought not to be appointed by the Chief Executive of the nation, but by the court to whom he belongs.

The object of the bill is twofold. It is to do away, likewise, with an office paid by fees. It has been found to be the source of all corruption where officers are allowed to retain the fees, thereby receiving what is in disproportion to the labor performed. If we want real reform in the civil service, Mr. Speaker, then these officers who receive fees should be made salaried officers and the fees should go into the Treasury. And when we make this a salaried office there is no reason why the appointing power should be vested in the Chief Executive of the United States. This officer is a local officer and should be appointed by the department to which it belongs, which is the judicial department of the District.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the proposition is to vest the power in the chief justice of the court of the District.

Mr. BRENTANO. No; in the court.

Mr. KEIFER. Is it in the judges or in the court?

Mr. BRENTANO. In the judges.

Mr. KEIFER. I understood the motion of the gentleman was to strike out "chief-justice," and insert "the President of the United States."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the amendment as it has been reduced to writing.

Mr. KEIFER. How does the bill read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill reads "shall be appointed by the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia." It is proposed to strike out "judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia" and insert "shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. KEIFER. Then, Mr. Speaker, the point I was about to make I still insist upon. That is that there is no constitutional power to vest in the judges of a court as distinguished from the court itself the right to make any such appointment as this. The distinction is very plain, and certainly will be very well understood by lawyers, that power cannot be conferred upon a judge or all judges that constitute a court unless it be conferred upon them as constituting the court itself.

Now, it is attempted here, as I maintain, in violation of the second section of article 2 of the Constitution of the United States, to confer a power upon judges, not upon the court. That section has reference to the powers and duties of the President, and the clause I call attention to reads thus:

But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

Not in the judges of the courts, but in courts acting as courts; and I insist, so far as concerns this vesting of appointment in the judges, this act would be held to be a nullity, being a violation of the Constitution. I am in favor, therefore, of the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Minnesota.

I wish to state another thing. I am unable to say why it is that the committee desire to change the mode of appointment of this particular officer; a higher officer than many others that are required to be appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate of the United States. It is sought here to consolidate two offices, to bring them together, and to vest in certain judges of the District an appointing power over which there is no review, of which no confirmation is required. It looks to me as if there was a singling out of this office for some special reason.

Mr. CLAFLIN. There is no objection, I think, to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KEIFER. Let me just add that I always find that where there is special legislation sought there is something wrong about it. It may not crop out on the surface, but sooner or later you find there is an ulterior purpose in it.

Mr. BRENTANO. I demand the previous question on the bill and pending amendment.

Mr. DUNNELL. There is another amendment that I desire to offer, to strike out of the third section the requirement of the three years' residence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield for that amendment?

Mr. BRENTANO. I do. I now move the previous question on the bill and the two pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was first on the following amendment, offered by Mr. DUNNELL:

In section 2 strike out the words "the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia" and insert "the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The question being taken, there were—ayes 65, noes 44.

Mr. FINLEY. No quorum has voted.

Mr. SPARKS. Let tellers be ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BRENTANO.]

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 75.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question was next on the following amendment, offered by Mr. DUNNELL:

In section 3 strike out the following words: "and shall have been a bona fide resident of said District for at least three years previous to his appointment."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the votes by which the amendments were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the passage of the bill.

Mr. PAGE. I call for a division.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 114, noes 16.

Mr. PAGE. A quorum has not voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DUNNELL and Mr. PAGE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 123, noes 19.

So (further count not being demanded) the bill was passed.

Mr. BRENTANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering District business referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDEN. Pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HUNTON. I hope the House will not adjourn. The committee has only one day in the month.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 314) to confirm the term of the period of seventeen years from the date of its original grant of the patent of Thomas A. Weston.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MAISH for three days.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. POLLARD, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House papers accompanying House bill No. 2515, granting a pension to the heirs of Lattern Herrington, there being no adverse report thereon.

STEAMSHIP LINE TO BRAZIL.

Mr. SWANN, by unanimous consent, presented a resolution passed by the Merchants' Exchange of Baltimore against the granting of a subsidy to the Roach line of steamships to Brazil; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN,] that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I hope the motion to adjourn will not prevail. The Committee on the District of Columbia have but one day in the month, and to-day have had but two hours.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I object to debate.

The question being taken on Mr. EDEN's motion, there were—ayes 47, noes 106.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering bills relating to the District of Columbia.

Mr. BRENTANO. I desire to make a further report from the committee, and I hope the chairman of the committee will yield to me for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, I yield for that purpose.

PRACTICE OF PHARMACY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BRENTANO, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3708) to regulate the practice of pharmacy in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any person, not a registered pharmacist within the meaning of this act, to conduct any pharmacy or store for the purpose of retailing, compounding, or dispensing medicines or poisons, for medicinal use, in the District of Columbia, except as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for the proprietor of any store or pharmacy to allow any person, except a registered pharmacist, to compound or dispense the prescriptions of physicians, or to retail or dispense poisons for medicinal use, except as an aid to, and under the immediate supervision of, a registered pharmacist. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be liable to a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $100 for each and every such offense.

SEC. 3. That immediately after the passage of this act, and biennially thereafter, or as often as necessary, the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall appoint three pharmacists and two physicians, all of whom shall have been residents of the District of Columbia for five years and of at least five years' practical experience in their respective professions, who shall be known and styled as commissioners of pharmacy for the District of Columbia, who shall serve without compensation, and who shall hold office for two years, and until their successors are appointed and qualified. Said commissioners shall, within thirty days after the notification of their appointment, each take and subscribe to an oath to impartially and faithfully discharge their duties as prescribed by this act. The position of any commissioner who shall fail to so qualify within the time named shall be vacant, and the vacancy or vacancies so occurring, or any vacancy or vacancies that may occur, shall be filled by the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 4. That the commissioners of pharmacy shall keep a book of registration open at some convenient place within the city of Washington, of which due notice shall be given through the public press, and shall record therein the name and place of business of every person registered under this act. It shall be the duty of said commissioners of pharmacy to register, without examination, as registered pharmacists, all pharmacists and druggists who are engaged in business in the District of Columbia at the passage of this act as owners or principals of stores or pharmacies for selling at retail, compounding, or dispensing drugs, medicines, or chemicals for medicinal use, or for compounding and dispensing physicians' prescriptions, and all assistant pharmacists, twenty-one years of age, engaged in said stores or pharmacies in the District of Columbia at the passage of this act, and who have been engaged as such in some store or pharmacy where physicians' prescriptions were compounded and dispensed for not less than five years prior to the passage of this act: Provided, however, That in case of failure or neglect on the part of any such person or persons to present themselves for registration within sixty days after said public notice, they shall undergo an examination such as is provided for in section 5 of this act.

SEC. 5. That the said commissioners of pharmacy shall, upon application, and at such time and place as they may determine, examine each and every person who shall desire to conduct the business of selling at retail, compounding or dispensing drugs, medicines, or chemicals for medicinal use, or compounding and dispensing physicians' prescriptions within the District of Columbia as pharmacists; and if a majority of said commissioners shall be satisfied that said person is competent and fully qualified to conduct said business of compounding or dispensing drugs, medicines, or chemicals for medicinal use, or to compound and dispense physicians' prescriptions, they shall enter the name of such person as a registered pharmacist in the book provided for in section 4 of this act.

SEC. 6. That no person shall be entitled to an examination by said commissioners of pharmacy for registration as pharmacist unless he present satisfactory evidence of being twenty-one years of age, and having served not less than four years in a store or pharmacy where physicians' prescriptions were compounded and dispensed, or is a graduate of some respectable medical college or university.

SEC. 7. That all graduates in pharmacy having a diploma from an incorporated college or school of pharmacy that requires a practical experience in pharmacy of not less than four years before granting a diploma, shall be entitled to have their names registered as pharmacists by said commissioners of pharmacy.

SEC. 8. That the commissioners of pharmacy shall be entitled to demand and receive from each person whom they register as pharmacists, without examination, the sum of $3, and from each person whom they examine the sum of $10. And in case the examination of said person should prove defective and unsatisfactory, and his name not be registered, he shall be permitted to present himself for re-examination within any period not exceeding twelve months next thereafter, and no charge shall be made for such re-examination. The money received under the provisions of this section shall be applied to the payment of such expenses as the commissioners may incur in executing the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. Every registered pharmacist shall be held responsible for the quality of all drugs, chemicals, and medicines he may sell or dispense, with the exception of those sold in the original packages of the manufacturer, and also those known as "patent medicines;" and should he knowingly, intentionally, and fraudulently adulterate, or cause to be adulterated, such drugs, chemicals, or medical preparations, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, be liable to a penalty not exceeding $100, and, in addition thereto, his name shall be stricken from the register.

SEC. 10. It shall be unlawful for any person, from and after the passage of this act, to retail any poisons enumerated in Schedules A and B, as follows, to wit:

SCHEDULE A.

Arsenic and its preparations, corrosive sublimate, white precipitate, red precipitate, biniodide of mercury, cyanide of potassium, hydrocianic acid, strychnia, and all other poisonous vegetable alkaloids and their salts, essential oil of bitter almonds, opium and its preparations, except paregoric and other preparations of opium containing less than two grains to the ounce.

SCHEDULE B.

Aconite, belladonna, colchicum, conium, nux vomica, henbane, savin, ergot, cotton-root, cantharides, creosote, digitalis, and their pharmaceutical preparations, croton-oil, chloroform, chloral hydrate, sulphate of zinc, mineral acids, carbolic acid and oxalic acid, without distinctly labeling the box, vessel, or paper in which the said poison is contained, and also the outside wrapper or cover, with the name of the article, the word "poison," and the name and place of business of the seller. Nor shall it be lawful for any person to sell or deliver any poisons enumerated in schedules A and B, unless, upon due inquiry, it be found that the purchaser is aware of its poisonous character, and represents that it is to be used for a legitimate purpose. Nor shall it be lawful for any registered pharmacist to sell any poisons included in schedule A without, before delivering the same to the purchaser, causing an entry to be made, in a book kept for that purpose, stating the date of sale, the name and address of the purchaser, the name and quality of the poison sold, the purpose for which it is represented by the purchaser to be required, and the name of the dispenser; such book to be always open for inspection by the proper authorities, and to be preserved for reference for at least five years. The provisions of this section shall not apply to the dispensing of poisons, in not unusual quantities or doses, upon the prescriptions of practitioners of medicine. Nor shall it be lawful for any licensed or registered druggist or pharmacist in the District of Columbia to retail, or sell, or give away any alcoholic liquors or compounds, as a beverage, to be drunk or consumed upon the premises. And any violation of the provisions of this section shall make the owner or principal of said store or pharmacy liable to a fine of not less than twenty-five and not more than one hundred dollars, to be collected in the usual manner.

SEC. 11. Any itinerant vender of any drug, nostrum, ointment, or appliance of any kind, intended for the treatment of disease or injury, or who shall, by writing, or printing, or any other method, publicly profess to cure or treat diseases, injury, or deformity by any drug, nostrum, manipulation, or other expedient, shall pay a license of $200 per annum into the treasury of the District of Columbia, to be collected in the usual way.

SEC. 12. That any person who shall procure, or attempt to procure, registration for himself or for another under this act by making, or causing to be made, any false representation, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be liable to a penalty of not less than twenty-five nor more than one hundred dollars, and the name of the person so fraudulently registered shall be stricken from the register. Any person not a registered pharmacist, as provided for in this act, who shall conduct a store, pharmacy, or place for retailing, compounding, or dispensing drugs, medicines, or chemicals for medicinal use, or for compounding or dispensing physicians' prescriptions, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $50.

SEC. 13. That all fines and penalties under this act shall be collected in the same manner that other fines and penalties are collected in the District of Columbia; and it shall be the duty of the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia to prosecute all violations of this act.

SEC. 14. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. BRENTANO. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. FINLEY. I hope the gentleman will allow me to ask him a question, or if he will not yield for that purpose that the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. BRENTANO. I will yield for a question.

Mr. FINLEY. I have not had an opportunity of examining this bill and know nothing of it except from hearing it read at the desk, but I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois why it is that in the ninth section you except patent medicines?

Mr. BRENTANO. He is not liable for the sale of patent medicines.

Mr. FINLEY. Does not the bill provide that all persons now engaged in the business of pharmacy in the District of Columbia shall be exempt from the provisions of the bill, and that they shall only apply to those who come hereafter?

Mr. BRENTANO. The bill is only prospective. I ask the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred upon the passage of the bill; and being put, there were—ayes 90, noes 18.

Mr. BROWNE. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BRENTANO and Mr. BROWNE were appointed.

The House again divided; and, before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. BROWNE said: I will not insist upon a further count.

Mr. BRAGG. The result of the vote has not been announced.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No further count was demanded.

Mr. BRAGG. But I desire to raise the question of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will then announce the vote now. There were 109 in the affirmative and 14 in the negative. The gentleman who represented the negative stated that no further count was demanded, and thereupon the Chair recognized that the opponents of the bill had conceded the point.

Mr. BRAGG. I insist that under the rules the Chair must announce the vote and that we have a right to raise the question of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The tellers will resume their places and the count will be continued; the Chair will not interfere with any of the gentleman's rights.

The tellers resumed their places; and the count having been continued and concluded, they reported—ayes 122, noes 26.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BRENTANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FINLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. HUNTER. Pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent to print some remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and the leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SINGLETON. I desire to make a report from the Committee on Appropriations. [Cries of "Regular order!"] I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to allow me to make this report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded by several gentlemen, and the Chair will have to put the question on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was put on Mr. FINLEY's motion; and on a division, there were—ayes 57, noes 76.

So the House refused to adjourn.

EADS JETTIES.

On motion of Mr. SINGLETON, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury with a communication from Captain Eads with regard to the jetty system, and the same was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on division, there were—ayes 64, noes 81.

So the House refused to adjourn.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WILLIAMS] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ELAM. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Pacific Railroads for printing and recommittal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WILLIAMS] yield for that purpose?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. There are several gentlemen here who desire to present matters for consideration, and if I yield to one I will have to yield to all; I cannot yield.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan; and upon a division there were—ayes 89, noes 34.

Mr. BRAGG. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, and Mr. BRAGG were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 79, noes 26.

Mr. BRAGG. No quorum has voted.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn; and upon a division there were—ayes 86, noes 66.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. HUNTON called for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were 24 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 21, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4674) for the relief of the sureties of John McNellis was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HAYDEN'S GEOGRAPHICAL ATLAS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution, received yesterday from the House of Representatives; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be bound 500 copies of the Geological and Geographical Atlas of Colorado and portions of the adjacent territory under the Hayden survey; one copy for distribution to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives and Delegate from the Territories; the balance for distribution by the office of the survey; the style of binding to be determined by the joint committee of the two Houses on printing.

TIMBER CULTURE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 396) to amend section 2464 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to the cultivation of timber on the public domain; which, on motion of Mr. PADDOCK, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the 16th ultimo, copies of the records showing the proceedings of the several boards of medical officers in the case of Captain William N. Jeffers.

Mr. SARGENT. Let the documents be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. In the judgment of many Senators after a board has been duly constituted and has discharged its duty and reported upon the physical condition of a candidate, there is no power to set aside the action of the board and order another. The statute reads as follows:

> No officer shall be promoted to a higher grade on the active list of the Navy until he has been examined by a board of naval surgeons and pronounced physically qualified to perform all his duties at sea.

The object of this statute is obvious. It is to secure to the public service sound and efficient officers. It cannot be disregarded safely or wisely, and Congress looks to the executive officers to execute this and all laws conscientiously, without evasion or favoritism. The board should be free from bias, of competent qualifications, and deal justly with the Government as well as by the candidate. If there is power to appoint a new board after setting aside the proceedings of the first, and then a third after a second, to give additional chances to pass to an applicant, it would seem that disinterested men should be selected as the jury. In this case the proceedings of the second board, which are made up with great particularity and care, with scrupulous attention to legal requisites, probably because the proceedings of the first board had been set aside for an alleged disregard to forms, are set aside on the ground of informality and that the adverse finding is against the evidence before the board. This latter point makes the revising power the judge of the qualifications of an officer, and it is not apparent why the board could not be dispensed with. It is at best, under such practice, an empty form. The third board, consisting of three, was made up of two medical officers who had testified in favor of the applicant, and the only ones who had, and a third who does not seem to have so or otherwise expressed an opinion. This would be called "packing" if it had been done by politicians. It is needless to say that the proceedings of this board were approved, and the officer is nominated to the Senate.

I desire to thus briefly direct attention to the construction of this statute, in favor with the Navy Department. I dissent from the law, but I more decidedly dissent from the practice. Either the Government has an interest in having these boards impartially, disinterestedly perform their functions, or it has not. If it has, men in a condition of mind to impartially examine should be appointed to perform the duty, and the witnesses and advocates of a candidate hardly come under this category. I move that the papers be printed and referred to the Naval Committee.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. THURMAN presented the petition of James A. Barr, of Champaign County, Ohio, late a second lieutenant Company I, Twenty-sixth Ohio Volunteers, praying for the passage of an act authorizing the Adjutant-General of the Army to correct his muster; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Thomas Smith and others, citizens of Ohio, praying for the passage of a law providing for the equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FERRY (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair) presented the petition of Dr. C. H. B. Kellogg and 84 others, citizens of Michigan, praying for the passage of an act to reimburse persons for money spent in defending their homesteads; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the memorial of H. L. Pelouze & Son, manufacturers of and dealers in type, &c., of the city of Washington, remonstrating against the passage of a bill to refund to Miller & Richards a fine of $3,183 imposed upon them for undervaluing a lot of goods passed through the custom-house at San Francisco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GROVER presented the memorial of S. B. Kidder and others, citizens of Oregon, engaged in sheep-farming, remonstrating against the repeal of the tariff on wool; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Joseph Lane McDonald, of the Territory of Alaska, praying for the repeal of the law to protect fur-bearing animals; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of Mrs. Harriet Downs Lewis, a tax-payer of Theresa, New York, praying that all public expenses arising from the use of alcoholic drinks be paid by those who vote for licensing the sale of such drinks; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the memorial of J. & F. B. Garrett, printers, of Syracuse, New York, remonstrating against the passage of a law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to Miller & Richards the amount of a fine imposed upon them as a penalty for undervaluing a lot of goods passed through the custom-house at San Francisco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROLLINS presented the petition of Powell M. Bradley and others, citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for an appropriation to rebuild the causeway between Mason's Island and the western shore of the Potomac River; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FERRY. I am instructed by a majority of the Committee on Finance to report back the bill (H. R. No. 4663) to forbid the further retirement of United States legal-tender notes, with a recommendation from the committee that the bill do pass without amendment. I desire to state in this connection that to-morrow I shall seek the floor to invite the Senate to consider this bill. I understand that one member of the committee, the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] desires to express his views upon the bill, and I shall endeavor to ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. FERRY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1008) relating to the Cumberland road in the State of Ohio, and to authorize the same to become a free road, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, praying for increased mail service on certain routes in Door and Kewaunee Counties, in that State, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and moved that the memorial be forwarded to the Postmaster-General, the matter being under his direction; which was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3109) granting a pension to Margaret Kenah, widow of Patrick Kenah, late a private of Company D, First United States Artillery, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3579) granting a pension to Philip Henry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 607) granting an increase of pension to Theodore C. Ray, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3573) granting a pension to Charles G. Galezio, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1175) granting a pension to George Silvers, private Company E, Fifty-seventh Regiment United States Volunteers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1272) to amend section 4127 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to the judicial powers and functions of consuls, to report it with an amendment. I ask the Senate to allow me to have the bill considered at this time. It will, I think, not take five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill and the amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I will state what the bill provides for. By the original section of the Revised Statutes it is provided that in certain countries consuls shall be clothed with judicial powers. Subsequent to the passage of that law, we have negotiated treaties with four other powers, giving judicial authority to American consuls and securing the right of trial before them to American citizens residing in those countries. The purpose of the bill is to extend our laws, so far as they are applicable, over those countries with whom we have since made treaties. The amendment proposes to make the law permanent and extend to other countries, if we shall make similar treaties, so that we shall not be obliged to amend the act every time we may make such a treaty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the bill reported to-day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is just reported.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I must ask that it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects, and the bill goes over under the rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that the amendment be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed, of course.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 585) to amend section 2763 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the employment of boats by collectors of customs, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 279) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi at Memphis, Tennessee, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1111) for the relief of Somerville & Davis, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3828) to amend section 23 of the act approved June 22, 1874, entitled "An act to amend customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties," reported it with amendments.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3373) for the relief of settlers on public lands under the pre-emption laws, to report it favorably. I will state that this bill is in the exact words of a bill which was considered by the Committee on Public Lands and reported favorably, perfected in the Senate, passed by the Senate, and sent to the House of Representatives. The bill is very brief, and I ask that it be considered now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reported for information, subject to objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the title.

The Chief Clerk read the bill by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that may go over, Mr. President. I dare say it is all right, but in justice to bills that are reported earlier, the morning hour ought to be given to those on the Calendar, it appears to me.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to state to the Senator from Vermont that this bill is exactly like a bill which was passed by the Senate and perfected by the assistance of the Senator from Vermont. This bill was introduced into the House after the passage of that bill by the Senate, and is copied from it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will be a very good reason for passing it to-morrow. As stated, it would be entirely satisfactory to me, I presume.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4413) to provide for the free entry of articles imported for exhibition by societies established for encouragement of the arts or sciences, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BECK, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4556) for the relief of F. W. Golladay, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 710) granting a pension to Jane D. Cotton, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1196) granting a pension to Jane D. Cotton, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. THURMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1283) for the relief of James A. Barr; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SAUNDERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1284) creating the Utah and Northern Railway Company, a corporation in the Territories of Utah, Idaho, and Montana, and granting the right of way to said company through the public lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, (by request,) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1285) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for furnishing trusses to disabled soldiers," approved May 28, 1872; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying argument in support of the bill, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CHANGE OF NAME OF STEAMBOAT.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask, at the request of another Senator, that a bill which will take but a single moment changing the name of a vessel, in respect to which there has been a good deal of delay, be taken up and passed. I refer to the bill (H. R. No. 3546) to change the name of the steamboat D. A. McDonald to Silver Wave. While the Secretary searches for the bill, I will remark that the committee inquired and received the usual proof of all the conditions-precedent to permitting the change of the name of such a vessel, and I think there can be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives further non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2507) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and asking a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WINDOM submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 2507, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have been unable to agree.

WM. WINDOM,
J. G. BLAINE,
R. E. WITHERS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

M. J. DURHAM,
HIESTER CLYMER,
A. HERR SMITH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WINDOM. I will state very briefly the grounds of disagreement in the minds of the committee of conference. The eighth, eleventh, and fourteenth amendments of the Senate constituted the points of difference. The eighth amendment reads as follows:

For completing the walls and putting on the roof of the new hospital for cadets, $21,886.46, to be available immediately.

There is a building now for hospital purposes partly completed. The walls are something more than half finished. The building is standing in an exposed condition and is deteriorating every year. It is needed very much by the institution. The House of Representatives, in the bill as it came to the Senate, proposed to appropriate $800 for a temporary board roof to preserve the walls of the hospital building. The Senate, believing that it would be much more economical to complete the building so as to have the use of it rather than to appropriate $800 for a temporary roof, which sum would be thrown away and the institution compelled to wait till some indefinite future time for the use of the building, agreed to appropriate a sum sufficient to finish the walls and to cover it, so that a small appropriation next year would complete it. The House disagreed to our amendment. The Senate conferees, believing it to be so important, could not consent to strike out this provision, believing that this is the cheapest time the building can ever be finished, and that it is in every way desirable to proceed with it, declined to recede from the amendment.

The eleventh amendment proposed by the Senate, on which the conference committee disagreed, is as follows:

For the purchase of a lake and adjoining lands, right of way to post, siphon and appendages, and water-pipe, and for laying of same, for procuring an adequate supply of water, $36,503.

The committee could have agreed upon a small appropriation for this purpose. There is already a contract for the purchase of a lake and fifty acres of land, which will supply the institution with pure water, for $5,000. That contract expires this summer; and it is believed by the commandant and others at the institution that if it be not appropriated for now it cannot be obtained. The committee on the part of the Senate believed it to be very important to obtain it, and therefore preferred to make another trial to obtain a portion at least of that appropriation.

Mr. WITHERS. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that that was not a contract, but a proposition to sell.

Mr. WINDOM. A proposition to sell, which I believe is secured by writing. There is a bond or refusal in writing for this purpose.

Mr. WITHERS. Exactly; at the option, however, of the authorities to accept it.

Mr. WINDOM. I am making a very brief statement of the facts, because I desire the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] who is conversant with the subject, from personal observation, to be a little more explicit upon some of these points than I am myself. I will say, however, before leaving these two points, that both these appropriations were unanimously recommended, as I am informed by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY,] by the Board of Visitors last summer.

The fourteenth amendment proposed to strike out this provision in the House bill:

SEC. 3. That only such number of the graduates of the United States Military Academy in any one year shall be entitled to appointment as second lieutenants in the Army as are required to fill vacancies of that grade existing on the 1st day of July in each year; those entitled to appointment to said vacancies to be determined by the academic board on the basis of their standing in the graduating class. And hereafter no supernumerary officers shall be attached to any company or corps of the Army, and all graduates of the Military Academy who are not appointed to the Army under the provisions of this act shall be discharged upon the graduation of their class.

The Senate struck out this provision, believing it to be unjust to the cadets and impolitic. The members of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate believed it to be so, and consequently could not recede from that amendment. We have reported the bill back with a disagreement, hoping to get an expression of the Senate upon these questions, that we may know the better how to act upon the coming conference. The Senator from Maine is personally conversant with these facts, and I should like to have him make some statement in reference to them.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I an no more personally conversant with this matter than the honorable Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.] By your favor, sir, last year, he and myself were the committee on the part of the Senate to unite with the Board of Visitors at West Point at the time of the examination, and we gave a very considerable degree of attention to the subject which is now the matter of difference between the two Houses, for although the points are three they really involve but one general consideration, which in a moment or two I will explain to the Senate.

The House conferees agreed with us to appropriate for the sewerage. There is $13,250 asked for the sewerage. There has been a very great necessity for that. Certain malarious diseases have afflicted the post for the last two or three years, which of course comes from local causes, because it is situated in one of the most healthful localities in the world; and it is only within a few years past that the great necessity for sewerage has been developed, and the representation has been very strong of the necessity for this. Now, if you have a complete system of sewerage there, you need a very strong head of water. The present water supply of the post is of but a very crude style. It is a rude dam in a mountain gorge or hollow in which a great deal of surplus water accumulates, giving them not water of the best quality, not such water as they ought to have, and in a season of drought, which is so apt to occur in that latitude in the latter months of the summer and early autumn, uniformly they have been compelled to haul water. The water supply has been found insufficient, and the property on the post, which is very large in value, has been endangered thereby; and of course with a system of sewerage, at the very time of the year when deficiencies as to sewerage would work the worst results, the sewers would be insufficient for the lack of a strong head of water. It was said in reply that for $15,000 they could, I might say cobble up or repair the present system of waterworks; but they never were such as ought to have been there; they never gave pure water; they never gave a reliable, steady supply; but for a sum of between $40,000 and $50,000 they can get a supply of water which is absolutely exhaustless, which is pure, and which will afford all that health can require.

In this connection I may mention what was referred to by the chairman of the committee, that Congress appropriated some years since for a new hospital. The old hospital was not well situated. It was directly on the road from West Point to Highland Village, a mile below, over which there is a great deal of travel. The hospital is just as near to the road as a building can be. It abuts on it. There is a good deal of noise all the time, which is not favorable for patients; and the accommodations are restricted, so that two or three patients are not infrequently in a single room. The hospital which was originally begun is in a very much better location, and some $72,000 were expended upon it, and then the House refused to appropriate further. The money required to finish it is about $17,000. The Senate voted a sufficient sum to do one-half of it this year, expecting to complete it the next. It was General Schofield's idea and that which the Board of Visitors concurred in, that it would be well to divide the sum so as to make a moderate appropriation each year.

Now the hospital and the sewerage and the water all connect themselves as one whole system, one sanitary plan, not only sanitary as to the water but needed for the safety of the property, but it is especially important in the sanitary relation.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like the Senator from Maine to state to the Senate that in the distribution of the work among the Board of Visitors it fell to the lot of that Senator and myself to be upon the committee upon public buildings and grounds, and that the question of the completion of the hospital building, the question of sewerage, and of the water supply, fell under our immediate eye and examination——

Mr. BLAINE. I shall only occupy the attention of the Senate a moment, and I shall be very glad to have the Senator from Texas speak, because he was not only on the committee, but he is himself a graduate of the academy, and more familiar with it, of course, than any visitor could be.

These points seemed to be so exceedingly important to the post, so urgent, and so exigent, that your committee of conference did not feel that they could sign any report that did not embody them. The whole appropriation for the three this year amount to about $40,000, if my memory is correct; $13,250 for the sewerage, $21,000 for the hospital, and $5,000 for the water-works.

Mr. WINDOM. Excuse me for having made a suggestion to the Senator privately just now as to the amount. I thought he alluded to the entire amendments.

Mr. BLAINE. No. What we offered was simply to secure the water now, and the next year provide for the finishing of the works. Of course, if the Senate desire to act otherwise, they will instruct us. We do not want to get into a mere chaff with the House upon some point of etiquette that is not material; but these points impressed our minds, and they did mine from the fact that I was some two weeks on the Point, specially examining them, as being so absolutely essential that we could not give them up. I should be very glad to hear the Senator from Texas, who is more familiar than I am with the subject.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, in distributing the duties of the Board of Visitors, it so fell out that the Senator from Maine and myself were placed upon the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. We made a personal inspection of the old hospital, which I state to the Senate is more than fifty years old. It is not provided with the appliances of the present day; it is not adapted to the present age. The new building has been carried to a point where it has either to be abandoned or completed. If abandoned, it is at a cost of some $72,000; and its completion is a necessity. Therefore we reported in favor of completing that building. So much for that as a matter of pure economy.

Second, the lower half of the plain at West Point is already provided with sewers and that part was reported to us as healthy, was so reported by the surgeon. The north half on the river is not provided with sewerage, and the result is that the sickness at the Point is in that portion of the plain, and it was suggested to us by the surgeon who accompanied us that it was necessary to the health of the plain that the sewerage should be completed. For that reason we reported that.

Now, as to the supply of water; that is not only a question of health but a question of economy. There have been there on two or three occasions fires: once the barracks were burned down; and fire has broken out once in the present new barracks. The want of a supply of water is dangerous to the buildings—the want of a supply for fire purposes outside of the necessity for purposes of health. Hence, both as a matter of health and as a matter of public economy, we recommended that the supply of water should be made abundant for the post for fire purposes and for purposes of health, and for the general purposes of the post.

These three recommendations we made upon a thorough personal inspection, and our report was made accordingly. We made that report to the Board of Visitors and it was unanimously concurred in by that board and the report was laid before the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments and agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives; and in making this motion I desire that the vote of the Senate shall express its judgment on this question rather than be a mere formal vote.

Mr. BECK. Before the vote is taken I desire to say a word in addition to what has been said. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations I considered this question as carefully as I could, as well as did the other members. It seems to me that we ought to ask the House again to reconsider their disagreement carefully.

The hospital, as has been said, has cost us $71,000, and it will require about $40,000 more, I understand, to finish it; so we propose to give them as much as will enable them to go on this year. If it is merely planked over, the building may as well be abandoned, because the walls, after a while, will become useless, I assume. It was made apparent to my mind that the young men who are now there—and they are young men sent from each district in the United States, selected by Representatives themselves, for education at West Point—are now in the old hospital, exposed to all contagious diseases that may break out there, and there is no means whereby, if scarlet fever, measles, or any other contagious disease breaks out, the officers can separate those who are not affected with these diseases from those who may be. So the life and the health of the young men who are sent there by Representatives themselves are in constant danger until a reasonably good hospital is finished. That certainly ought to recommend itself to the consideration of gentlemen who have the responsibility of sending young gentlemen to that place.

Then it was made apparent to us that malaria and other diseases were prevailing there that were unknown to West Point years ago, because of the want of sewerage; that the condition of one part of the plain at least that was referred to by the Senator from Texas had been changed from being healthy to an unhealthy place, and that good sewerage would remedy all that. It seemed to me that it was important for the health of the professors and students and everybody else, if it could be remedied in that way, that it should be so remedied.

Then again it was shown that there was not a cistern on the place. We had left agents there to take charge of our property, property so valuable that no private man would allow it to remain in the condition it is without having a water supply to extinguish fires if nothing else; and yet the United States has never provided the means to extinguish a fire if one breaks out there. An abundant supply of water can now be obtained at a reasonable cost, which if sold to private parties may be converted into a nuisance deleterious to the institution, and which may not be had again because our contract to have it expires with the expiration of this session of Congress and we thought it was well to secure it and to provide at once for the supply of water, the sewerage, and the hospital.

I agree with the chairman of the committee that we had better have the yeas and nays of the Senate, so as to make the expression as decided as Senators may see fit to make it, and show the other House what our opinion is at least.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I forgot to state one thing when I was up before. In the examination to which I referred of the old hospital, the new hospital, the sewerage, and the water supply, the Senator from Maine and myself had the advantage, and the great advantage, too, of the presence during all that examination of the chairman of the House Military Committee, who was also a member of the committee on public buildings and grounds at West Point of the Board of Visitors, and he concurred with our views.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota that the Senate further insist and agree to the further conference.

Mr. ALLISON. I think, with a view of ascertaining the sense of the Senate with reference to these amendments, we had better have the yeas and nays of the Senate on the question of further insisting.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WITHERS. As the yeas and nays have been asked for in order to give imposing force to the views of the Senate, I wish to state, as a member of the subcommittee and also of the conference committee, that I fully concur in the views which have been expressed relative to the importance of the Senate amendments to the West Point appropriation bill. The sewerage appropriation is so manifestly absolutely essential to the health of the inmates of the institution that I presume no difficulty will be found in regard to that. The only questions likely to arise between the House and Senate and to occasion any difficulty are the appropriations for the purchase of the water supply and for the completion of the hospital building. I believe that a sound economy demands that appropriations shall be made in accordance with the amendments which have been introduced in the bill by the Senate in its action.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 54, nays 0; as follows:

YEAS—54.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Chair calls up the unfinished business, which is the bill (H. R. No. 4245) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint James Shields, of Missouri, a brigadier-general in the United States Army on the retired list.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I intended this morning to call up the resolution offered by me in regard to the committee on Treasury accounts a few days ago; but I notice the Senator from Vermont who took some interest in the resolution [Mr. MORRILL] is not now in his seat, and therefore I refrain from calling it up, but I give notice that to-morrow morning I shall ask the Senate to take it up.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. President, on this day a week ago I gave notice of my intention to move to take up to-day Senate bill No. 942, to the exclusion of other business, being the bill known as the Texas Pacific Railroad bill, but not with the intention of having the bill considered with a view to its disposition at this time, but for the purpose of taking the floor in order to give it to the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] who expected to be ready to address the Senate on that bill to-day. I have since been informed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] and the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. DORSEY,] as members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, that they were very urgent for the consideration to-day of the bill reported from that committee in reference to the government of this District. I have conferred with the Senator from Mississippi in respect to his convenience, and with his consent am willing to postpone the motion which I intended to make, which was merely to informally lay aside the pending business for that purpose, provided it is understood, and I should be glad to have it understood with the Senate to-day, that at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow the other business then pending of the Senate may be laid aside informally for the purpose of enabling the Senator from Mississippi to speak on this question.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President, I am very anxious to address the Senate upon this measure in which my constituents have a deep and intense interest. I have occupied the attention of the Senate very briefly and at very rare intervals since I have had the honor of being admitted to a seat on this floor, and I should be greatly obliged if the opportunity should be accorded to me to make a few remarks on this subject to-morrow.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, at the conclusion of the business before the Senate I shall ask the consideration of the House bill, with the Senate amendment, providing a permanent form of government for this District. I hope that it will be antagonized by no other measure, and I shall ask the Senate to continue the consideration of that bill until it is concluded. I should hope that result might be reached to-day, but if it should continue over to-morrow, I should have no objection to its being informally laid aside to enable the Senator from Mississippi to submit his remarks, with the understanding that the consideration of that bill shall then again be resumed.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, in consideration of the fact that the Committee on Finance reported to-day the House bill preventing the further retirement of legal-tender currency I had concluded in my own mind not to call up the regular order this afternoon, especially as the Senator from Michigan, now occupying the chair, gave notice that to-morrow, after the morning hour, he would call up the bill reported by himself from the Committee on Finance, with a view to the action of the Senate upon it. Upon that bill at that time I understand the Senator from Delaware, a member of the Finance Committee, desires to address the Senate, and I do not think I should be justified in yielding that business for the business called for by the Senator from Ohio, however much and however sincerely I might desire to oblige both him and the Senator from Mississippi. I do not think the bill reported from the Finance Committee this morning will take much time. I doubt indeed if it will provoke further discussion than the speech of the Senator from Delaware, and then perhaps we can have a vote upon it. Subject to that, I should be glad to co-operate with the Senator from Ohio in procuring a proper opportunity for the Senator from Mississippi to address the Senate; but it is due to frankness to say that after the morning hour to-morrow I shall feel it my duty, as I presume the Senator from Michigan now occupying the chair will feel it his, to insist upon taking up the measure reported from the Committee on Finance to-day.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I should like to inquire, through the Chair, of the Senator from Indiana if he understood that my request extended beyond the ordinary courtesy of merely allowing the Senator from Mississippi to take the floor for the purpose of addressing the Senate, laying aside only informally the pending business and not with a view of displacing it?

Mr. VOORHEES. I know; but it presents this delicate point: the Senator from Michigan has already notified the Senate that he will call up the measure reported from the Finance Committee to-morrow after the morning hour, upon which the Senator from Delaware desires to address the Senate, notice of which was given by the Senator from Michigan prior to the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MATTHEWS. The Senator is entirely mistaken as to the priority. I gave this very notice one week ago to-day and the Senator from Michigan only spoke this morning, for the bill was only reported from the committee this morning. One week ago I gave notice that I would to-day ask this courtesy of the Senate on behalf of the Senator from Mississippi; but inasmuch as the urgency of the bill from the District Committee was such that they appealed to me to give way for a single day, I thought I might ask the indulgence of the Senate for to-morrow on behalf of the Senator from Mississippi, simply for the purpose of allowing him to speak to that question, without interfering with the regular order. I trust that the Senator from Indiana will, as I am sure the Senator from Michigan now in the chair will, be willing to allow the matter to take that course as it will not prejudice in any wise, I think, the speedy determination of the bill to which reference has been made.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I understand that the regular order was formally set aside yesterday on a yea-and-nay vote, the regular order being the finance bill. Now the Senator from Michigan reports another bill from the Committee on Finance this morning which in many respects covers the same points as the bill formerly under consideration, and gives notice that the bill will be taken up to-morrow. So I can see no difficulty in the way if the Senator from Mississippi only desires to submit his remarks to-morrow, and then let the regular order proceed, whatever it may be.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the bill reported from the Committee on Finance to-day did not meet my approval. I propose to give my reasons for that dissent when the bill shall be brought before the Senate, at any time when it may be the pleasure of the Senate to have the question discussed; but there is no desire on my part to antagonize the convenience or the wishes of the honorable Senator from Mississippi, but on the contrary a strong desire to yield to him that personal accommodation which I am glad to say is the usual feature of arranging business in this body.

I do not care in the least to delay the passage of the bill referred to by the honorable Senator from Indiana, whenever it shall please the Senate to pass it. With or without the expression of my opinion, I shall be ready to vote. But so far as this matter of arrangement is concerned, I should feel myself called upon to-morrow to vote to take up the railroad measure referred to by the Senator from Mississippi, for the purpose of allowing him to make a speech which he desires to make in view of the peculiar interest he has expressed for his constituents. I merely say this, in order that there may be no clash whatever and no misunderstanding whatever in regard to the easy, and I may call it polite, progress of business in this body.

Mr. FERRY, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) Inasmuch at the Senator from Delaware has courteously surrendered his right to speak on the bill which was reported this morning from the Committee on Finance, it would seem as though the Senator from Indiana would now withhold pressing the consideration of that bill for the purpose of affording the Senator from Mississippi the ordinary courtesy that is accorded to any Senator when he asks to be heard in the Senate. The Senator from Ohio, as he has stated, did give notice some days since that to-day he would call the attention of the Senate to the bill which he now desires to present for consideration, but on account of the pressure of the Senator from Kansas representing the District Committee he has waived that, as I understand, until to-morrow. Now it seems to me that there can be no objection to taking up the bill that was reported this morning from the Committee on Finance, and when it is before the Senate I will then move to lay aside that bill inasmuch as the Senator from Delaware is willing to yield the floor, as he is entitled to it, for the purpose of listening to the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi. When those remarks are concluded, I shall then ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the finance bill when the Senator from Delaware will have the floor.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Then, Mr. President, with the understanding that I now understand has taken effect that the Senator from Mississippi will be entitled to the floor at the expiration of the morning business to-morrow, laying aside temporarily and informally any pending business, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. SARGENT and others. Regular order!

JAMES SHIELDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the bill (H. R. No. 4245) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint James Shields, of Missouri, a brigadier-general in the United States Army on the retired list; which is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] If present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. LAMAR, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, Mr. DAVIS. If present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 32, nays 28; as follows:

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to state that I understood that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] was paired with my colleague, [Mr. CHAFFEE.]

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, there came from the House of Representatives a bill granting a pension to General Shields. Several Senators who have expressed their opposition to the pending bill indicated their willingness to vote for a bill of that sort. I have not seen that bill but I think that view expressed by Senators ought to be considered, and in order that it may be I move that this bill be committed to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the bill will not be committed, but that we shall have final action on it.

Mr. INGALLS. The Committee on Pensions have already examined the case of General Shields and have reported a bill for his relief placing him on the pension-list at $50 a month. That bill went to the House of Representatives and was returned here with an amendment fixing the rate at $100 a month, so that there is no necessity for referring this matter to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions what is the highest rate of pension that has been allowed to any officer by way of pension?

Mr. INGALLS. Fifty dollars is the highest rate established by law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that the bill be committed to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAINE. Before that vote is taken I wish to make a remark upon what fell from the Senator from Ohio yesterday, not particularly relative to this bill, but the statement was so extraordinary that it arrested my attention, and it struck me as still more extraordinary when I read it this morning in the RECORD. The honorable Senator from Ohio, in debating this bill yesterday, said:

> We have a little civil pension list in this country. It is confined, however, entirely to judges of the Federal courts; and the only justification in the world for it, and the ground upon which it was put by the committee that introduced the bill and by those who spoke upon it, was that owing to the constitutional provision that a judge should hold his office during good behavior, and therefore during life in almost every case, the only way in which you could get rid of an incompetent judge was to pension him off by allowing him to resign and continue his pay. It is a matter of history, as we all know, that we have had to resort to that to get rid of several judges who were totally disqualified to discharge their duties, one of whom was a lunatic, absolutely insane, and others totally disqualified to discharge their duties.

That bill was passed the first month that the honorable Senator entered this body; and of course his recollection of the debate would be accurate probably from that fact. I remember it very well from another circumstance in the House of Representatives, and according to my recollection I do not believe that any such thing occurred. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken. I do not think that that ground was put forward. I think the bill was put forward on the ground that an eminent judiciary whose members had illustrated their career by fidelity and integrity and purity should be rewarded; and it was confined to those who had seen ten years' service on the bench and had reached the age of seventy years. Now, the Senator states that the only reason for passing that bill and the reason avowed in debate was to get rid of judges whom you could not get rid of otherwise. I think the honorable Senator does himself great injustice, and great injustice to the historic nature of that bill, and to those for whose benefit it was passed.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Maine before he sits down allow me to say that the judge whose name was most frequently cited as the person to whom that pension bill would first and immediately apply was one of the most distinguished democratic judges in the country and then in the full possession of a most vigorous and powerful understanding and in the full possession of the respect of the entire American people for the integrity and purity of his judicial character?

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Massachusetts is entirely correct. He alludes to Robert C. Grier, for whom I inherited through three generations a friendship that made me extraordinarily active in behalf of that bill. I worked for that bill for his benefit, and I never knew that it was to get rid of a lunatic or an incompetent man and that that was the only motive, as the Senator from Ohio said, for passing that bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, now, the Senator is very unnecessarily indignant in "vindicating the truth of history," as he supposes. He may vindicate it at the end of the Capitol where he was then. I know the history of the bill in this end of the Capitol. Instead of that bill being confined to those illustrious men of whom the Senator from Maine has spoken, it applies to every petty district judge throughout the whole Republic, men by no manner of means illustrious, and to whom God never gave the faculty of being illustrious. It applies to the whole of them, and one of them was a lunatic and another of them was so decrepit that he had not been able to perform any service in his court for years; and the very judge of the highest court whom the Senator has mentioned, and whom I do not think it was in very good taste to mention in this connection, had to be carried by porters to his seat on the bench for a long time before that bill was passed. I admit that his intellect was fine, but his body was feeble, and it was time he had retired.

Mr. President, I know about that bill. It was matured in the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. The very provision to which the Senator alludes of the ten years' service was put in on my own motion. That bill never would have been recommended by that committee, never would have passed the Senate, but for the fact that it was the only way in which you could get rid of a judge who had become incompetent and who was in the Federal service. It was no sentimentality about illustrious character or illustrious services that carried that bill; nothing of that kind, sir. The Senate never intended to make a civil pension list for illustrious character; the Senate never sought to pension Jefferson, or Madison, or John Quincy Adams, or any other of the illustrious men in the civil service of the country. It never intended to make a civil pension list for the judges or for anybody else. It was simply a matter of absolute necessity that we should pass such a bill as that in order that we might have an active, efficient, and working judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio that the bill be committed to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VOORHEES. Before the vote is taken I desire to concur in the hope expressed by the Senator from Kansas that that motion will not prevail. With the greatest possible respect to the Senator from Ohio I desire to say that we have done our part as a Committee on Pensions in regard to General Shields. There is nothing more for us to do, and I hope the case will not go again to us.

Mr. THURMAN. When I made that motion I was not aware that the committee had reported. I withdraw the motion and will substitute another for it. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert the bill reported by the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not want to prolong the debate, but on a matter of fact I desire to say to the honorable Senator from Ohio that I think he is mistaken in stating himself as the author of the ten-year clause in the judiciary bill. I think he will find that it came from the House. It is mere matter of memory between us, but I think he will find it came from the House.

Mr. HEREFORD. When the last vote was taken on agreeing in the Senate to the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] announced himself as having been paired with my colleague, [Mr. DAVIS.] I obtained that pair not knowing that my colleague had been previously paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. CHAFFEE.] The change should be made now if it is desirable; but it makes no difference in the result. I have since been informed by the Senator from Colorado in his seat [Mr. TELLER] that that pair was made by my colleague.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. My amendment is to strike out the bill and insert the bill for a pension of $100 a month.

Mr. INGALLS. No, $50 was the Senate bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I move to insert the House bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the House pension bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Is that in order?

Mr. INGALLS. There is no such House bill.

Mr. CONKLING. It is a House amendment to a Senate bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Chair hold that to be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is open to amendment. The amendment is in order. The Secretary will report the amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. I have been misinformed as to the way the bill stands. I am told it is a House amendment to a Senate bill. Let the amendment be read. I send it to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James Shields, late a brigadier-general of the United States Volunteers, at the rate of $100 per month, said pension to be in lieu of that which he now receives.

Mr. SARGENT. Is that germane? I raise the point of order that that is not germane.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is in order.

Mr. INGALLS. I concur with the Senator from California in agreeing that that is not a proper motion to make and cannot be entertained by the Chair under Rule 43. The question upon the pension bill of the Senate as amended by the House is whether the Senate will concur in the House amendment. It is not possible to move that that bill shall be an amendment to the bill now pending before the Senate in regard to the retiring of General Shields. If the Chair will refer to Rule 43, he will observe the motions that can be made when a question is pending. The pending question is upon the bill retiring General Shields, whether it shall be amended in the Senate or not. It cannot be amended by the pension bill that has come from the House, because the pending question on that bill is whether the Senate will concur in the House amendment. Therefore, this motion is clearly out of order.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator from Kansas a question?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Shall I understand the Senator to maintain that under the right to amend the Senator from Ohio cannot move as his own language, no matter whether the House has acted upon it or not, anything that he chooses, to vary, modify, reverse, or contradict the original meaning of this bill?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator does not understand me to hold that.

Mr. CONKLING. That he cannot——

Mr. INGALLS. I say that he can.

Mr. CONKLING. Then is the criticism that he offers it as a House bill?

Mr. INGALLS. Exactly. It was also read by the Secretary from the original House bill.

Mr. THURMAN rose.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Ohio may trust me to defend him against the allegation that he offered it as a House bill. He offers the text or substance of a paper, which paper he described as an amendment of the House of Representatives to a Senate bill. Of course this does not become a House bill when he offers it. But whether he takes it out of the Decalogue, or out of Thomas Jefferson, or out of Joseph Chitty, or out of the doings of the House of Representatives, or no matter whence it comes, I take it there can be no doubt that he has a right to move, in the proceedings of most of the States in another form, but in our proceeding to strike out all after the enacting clause, so that the bill remains the identical bill that it is, and put into it anything that he pleases, says our Manual, no matter how much it may reverse the sense, so that it be not disrespectful to the body in which he offers it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state his understanding of the question. House bill No. 4245 being before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the question was not upon section 1 but upon the bill; and an amendment was offered by the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] in the form of section 2, which was adopted in Committee of the Whole, and concurred in when the bill reached the Senate. The question is not on concurring in an amendment of the House, but it is a House bill which has not yet been acted upon in the Senate. The Senate has only adopted one amendment to it. The question now recurs upon the passage of the bill in a stage when it is open to amendment in the Senate at the option of any Senator.

Mr. BLAINE. When I made my inquiry first, I thought the Senator from Ohio moved to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the original House bill to put General Shields on the retired list. That was the motion the Senator from Ohio originally made as I understood, and if he did that, that I maintain was not in order.

Mr. THURMAN. I mentioned the House bill because I wanted the provisions of that bill and I had not the bill before me so that I could write out my amendment myself, and so I said "the provisions of the House bill."

Mr. BLAINE. But the point I made was that the Senator might take the exact words of the bill putting General Shields on the retired list wholly and apart from its being a House bill, and it would not be in order to strike out the amendment and put this in, because it would be tantamount to disagreeing at once to that which the Senate had inserted, and therefore I made the point that the Senator could not move as a substitute the exact words of the original bill retiring General Shields; but the other I entirely agree is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not rule upon an anticipated case. The Chair rules upon the case before the Senate.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to inquire did not the Senator from Ohio send to the desk in his own hand, on a separate piece of paper, what he proposes to insert?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not rule upon suppositious cases, but upon the motion as made. The Chair rules that the Senator from Ohio in submitting this amendment, which will now be read by the Secretary, is in order. The amendment is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert what will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James Shields, late a brigadier-general of the United States Volunteers, at the rate of $100 per month, said pension to be in lieu of that which he now receives.

Mr. SARGENT. The point of order I desired to make was that the Senate in Committee of the Whole and also in the Senate have inserted certain matter in this House bill as a second section; and as it would not be in order directly to move to strike that out I wish to know whether it is in order to do it indirectly by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting other matter.

Mr. THURMAN. That very point was decided the other day on the bankrupt law repeal bill. We inserted "September 1," and after that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] moved to strike out the whole clause, including "September 1," and the Chair ruled, and was sustained by the Senate, that it was in order to move to strike out what had been inserted if you only struck out more with it.

Mr. SARGENT. At that very time a motion to strike out the whole paragraph was pending, when the Senator from Ohio rose and desired to perfect the text and was allowed to do it, and then the vote came on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. THURMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. SARGENT. I speak from my own recollection; the Senator can speak for himself. I am very well satisfied that was the history of the matter. The Senator from Kentucky first making his motion to strike out the whole paragraph, the Senator from Ohio rose and claimed the right to perfect the paragraph before it should be stricken out, and on that plea, although it was contested by the Senator from Kentucky, very warmly, he was allowed to have the vote taken on his motion, which was to perfect a portion of it. Subsequently the vote was taken upon the motion of the Senator from Kentucky to strike out the whole clause, and it was voted down. That is my recollection of the matter. This is not a parallel case at all. By all the forms in which it can do so, the Senate has put into the House bill the second section; and the point, I ask with deference to the Chair, is whether it can now do indirectly under the rules what it cannot do directly, that is, strike out what it has already inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would rule that the Chair could not entertain a motion, the Senate having adopted section 2, to strike out that section. But the Senate has not yet acted upon section 1. If the Senate had not amended section 1 in Committee of the Whole and reported it to the Senate, it would be competent to move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert what the Senator from Ohio proposes. The effect of adopting section 2 does not change the right of the Senator from Ohio to offer to strike out matter that has not been acted upon, even though he included matter that has been adopted. It is entirely different matter. The Chair entertains the motion. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I regret very much that I was called out of the Senate and not sent for when the vote was taken sometime ago in the Senate concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. I should have said then what I rise to say now, and I have very little to say now.

I wish once more to enter my protest against what is a habit in this House, and I am ashamed to say the habit in almost all legislative bodies, and it has been practiced on this occasion, of assuming that gentlemen say what they do not say, and then answering what they do not say. Now, I say there is not a man here who opposed the amendment to insert the name of General Grant because of any opposition to General Grant. And yet there seems to be a desire in some quarters to make it go to the country or appear to the country that some of us opposed that amendment because it was for the benefit of General Grant. There has not been one word dropped from this side of the Senate to justify any such imputation, and I say here that the imputation is untrue and gratuitous.

Sir, I would have voted against the amendment if it had included the name of George B. McClellan and not General Grant, and I would have voted just as readily against an amendment seeking to put George B. McClellan, a distinguished general and a distinguished democrat, on the retired list as I did vote against the amendment to put General Grant on the retired list. I voted on principle. As I stated before, I was willing to vote to put General Shields on the retired list because of a principle in which he is exceptional. He needs it; his condition is peculiar, and he deserves it. General Grant deserves it; General McClellan deserves it; there are a hundred men in this country who deserve it; but they do not need it, and I for one will not tax the people of the United States to support a man who is already supported or amply able to support himself. That is the principle on which I go, and it is not because the amendment is to benefit General Grant. It may be very creditable to gentlemen's sharpness, but not creditable to their frankness, to attempt to put a version on this vote which no man intended it should have and which all the facts do not justify.

I do not stop to inquire whether the man whose name is proposed is a democrat or a republican; the only question with me is, first, has he rendered service that justifies this distinction; second, is he in a condition to need it and does he need it? I am willing to tax the people, and the people are willing to tax themselves, to support a distinguished servant who is in a condition to need that support, who is helpless without that support; but I am not willing to set the precedent of taxing the people of the United States in the present condition of the country to support a man who does not need that support and who does not ask that support.

I asked the Senator from California yesterday if General Grant asked this support. The Senator said if he asked it he would not give it to him. And the implication was made from several quarters that it would not be very reputable for an applicant to ask. Why, sir, your law is framed on that very assumption, that men do ask. Take section 1243 of the revised code. It provides that where there has been an officer of forty years' continuous service he may, upon his application, be placed upon the retired list; upon his application, not otherwise. So, if he has been thirty years in continuous service he may, on his application, be placed on the retired list in the discretion of the President. If he has been forty years in continuous service, he has a right to be placed upon the retired list, but only upon asking it. If he has been only thirty years in continuous service, the President may in his discretion place him upon the retired list, but only on his application. Here is your law giving both these classes of officers a right to be put on the retired list, only when they ask it; and yet gentlemen seem to say that in the case of General Grant it would be disreputable to ask it. Not at all, sir.

Mr. President, I do think there is a principle involved here, and a very grave one, and one that I think will go home to the people. I hesitate, not because it is for General Grant, not because it may be for any other individual, but I do hesitate to record my vote under any circumstances to recognize the principle that a man who does not need this support, one who is in health and vigor and strength and able to take care of himself should be put on the retired list, thus increasing the taxation of the country, because I do not know where the limit will be. The Senator from California has already brought before the Senate a very long list of gentlemen who have rendered distinguished service to their country, and if you look simply to the question of honoring them, if you look simply to the question of recognizing their services, it would be very proper to place all of them on the retired list, but they do not need it. Why tax the people of the United States to support men who do not need their support? If this is to be inaugurated in the present case under the auspices of a great name like that of General Grant, I do not know where the end may be. Otherwise, if it was a mere tribute to General Grant, if it was a mere recognition of his services, there would be no trouble at all about it. That is not the question in a case of this kind. We retire men who have spent their days in the judiciary and support them, simply because they retire under our law at an age which implies that they are unable to support themselves. General Grant does not need this recognition of his services. If gentlemen tender it as an honor, he who has administered this Government for eight years does not need this recognition of his services; he does not need this tribute to his honor; and I must say that I do not believe General Grant would accept it. I do not know, however; perhaps he might; he does not refuse much. [Laughter.] Yet I do not believe he would accept it. I will say for him that I believe if he knew his name was being used in any way to jeopard a brave old disabled soldier he would disapprove it. I will say that for him, for there are many features in General Grant's character which are beautiful. When he was offered General Lee's sword and refused it his words were enough to bring the tears to any man.

All I have to say is that while I was anxious to vote for this bill for General Shields I regret very much that the amendment has been placed on it, for it requires me to set a precedent which I am not willing to follow. I am willing to say here that I am ready to vote to support any man who has rendered distinguished service to his country by the hazard of his life, and who has come to old age penniless and in want, and needing the support of the Government. I will give him a support as the shadows of evening gather about him. I will not send him to his eternal home hungry and naked. But a man who does not need that support, a man who is already provided for—there is no reason why I should seek to place him in the category of one who does need it. Under the circumstances I confess I have some embarrassment about this vote, but I believe I shall vote for the motion to amend made by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I had hoped that the Senate would have adopted the bill for the relief of General Shields just as it came from the House of Representatives. Quite a number of Senators who have advocated the amendment announced themselves yesterday as opposed to the measure in toto, and will doubtless vote against the bill as it is amended. I announced yesterday that it seemed apparent to me that a majority of those voting for the amendment did so for the purpose of defeating this bill. I hope the substitute offered by the Senator from Ohio——

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does the Senator make that remark in view of the remark just made by the Senator from Georgia as to the propriety of drawing inferences?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Minnesota ought to remember, and stretch his memory a little to recollect when the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] yesterday announced precisely what I have stated, that they were opposed to the bill, and intended to vote against it with this amendment put upon it.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does that sustain the statement——

Mr. COCKRELL. And they voted for the amendment, and that sustains precisely what I said.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does that sustain the statement of the Senator from Missouri that a majority upon this side of the House voted for the amendment with that intention?

Mr. COCKRELL. Only two Senators upon that side have disclaimed any such intention—the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] and the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] Two have declared such intentions, and I leave them there, balanced equally.

Mr. SARGENT. How many on this side of the Chamber have declared that they will vote against the bill with Grant on it? The way in which Senators announce their votes is on the roll-call. Wait until the roll is called.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to ask a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Does the Senator from Missouri desire to be understood as saying that I voted to place the amendment upon the original bill for the purpose of voting it down and defeating it?

Mr. COCKRELL. I understood the Senator to say he was opposed to the whole measure.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That is true.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then why amend it in that way unless it was for the purpose of trying to defeat it?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I supposed probably in the minds of some men it might strengthen the bill. I had not reached that point yet to believe that attaching the name of General Grant to a bill would load it down so that it would compel a majority of the Senate to vote against it. I announced my own determination to vote against it because I believed the whole principle was wrong.

Mr. HILL. But did not the Senator know very well that attaching the name of any gentleman to the bill who did not need the support and to whom the principle of the bill did not apply would injure the bill, whether General Grant or anybody else?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I supposed myself that attaching the name of General Grant to the bill would strengthen it, and I inquired yesterday of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] why it was, and how it could be, that to gentlemen who believed that the principle of the bill, taking civilians and putting them on the retired list, was right, placing the name of General Grant there would defeat it.

Mr. HILL. For the same reason that if you placed the name of George B. McClellan there it might injure the bill. They do not need it, and it is not the principle upon which the bill is based.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I do not think the people of this country estimate the services of George B. McClellan and of Ulysses S. Grant alike; I certainly do not. What I rose to say, however, was this: the Senator from Missouri travels out of his proper sphere when he imputes to me any obliquity of motive in any vote I cast here. He has no right to do it; and when he does it and says it he does and says what is not the fact.

Mr. COCKRELL. The RECORD will speak. The Senator from Iowa yesterday, in this Chamber, uttered these words; let history record what they mean and the difference between what they mean and what he has said to-day:

> This bill proposes to make a wholly new departure, as I understand, in what has heretofore been the policy of our country. It proposes to establish a new policy which I do not believe to be a wise policy.
> I think if we commence this thing we shall find men all over this country, in every State in the Union, who are old—they may not have all been born in Ireland, but men who are needy and who have served their country faithfully and patriotically. If we undertake to place them all on the retired list of the Army of the United States those of us who have farms will have to sell our farms to raise the money to pay them. For that reason I shall vote against this bill, whether the name of General Grant be attached to it or whether it be not attached.

Was the Senator aiming to strengthen the bill when he was adding to it a provision which he himself condemned?

Mr. President, I meant no disrespect to any Senator on this floor. No Senator can accuse me of showing disrespect or want of appreciation for the feelings of every Senator upon this floor, however widely I may differ from him. I was opposed to the amendment which the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Vermont and others advocated, and which has been adopted by the Senate, to this bill. I am opposed to it still. There is no parallel between General Shields on the one side and General Grant on the other. General Shields is an isolated, exceptional case, appealing to the long-deferred justice of the Government. His wounds, his age—sixty-nine years old, his enfeebled condition, his standing upon the very precipice of time, in want, in need, in destitution, unable to earn a dollar by the sweat of his brow, whereby he has earned all that he has, and the honor and the glory which he has caused to cluster around our Government and the causes which he has espoused, all call upon us. General Grant is not in that condition, and I pray God that he may never be in the condition of General Shields. If he approached one-half the way in age, in feebleness, in destitution that General Shields to-day occupies, I would go further than the Senator from Iowa to relieve him, to save him, to place his declining years in a proper condition, and let him breathe out his last peacefully, gloriously, without destitution, or want, or suffering.

Now, Mr. President, I hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio will not be adopted. Senators can vote as they choose. We understand this question, and we certainly ought to be able to dispose of it and dispose of it at once. I for one shall vote against the substitute.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I trust the amendment of the Senator from Ohio will be voted down. I intend to vote for the bill as it is now amended. I should not have voted for the bill unless the amendment was put upon it. I should not have voted for it because I believe, so far as General Shields is concerned, his friends have used extravagant language in picturing his necessities, his infirmities, his poverty, &c. I think the Senator who has just sat down, carried away by the strength of his imagination, has indulged in this characteristic. General Shields certainly is in remarkable good health, traveling all over the country, lecturing for $100 a night or thereabouts. It is not denied that he has abundant property in Missouri. He is named as a candidate for the Senate from that State. He is not buried in oblivion. He is not suffering from necessities. He is not poor, and lame, and old, and halt, as gentlemen would have us believe. His friends deny the imputation that he is begging at the doors of the Capitol for legislation like this. The sudden necessity for this relief, so far as he is concerned, is somewhat remarkable. It was only when in another body the republicans made him a candidate for keeper of the House that it was suddenly discovered that he had been for years shamefully neglected by the Government of the United States; and it was left to a republican to discover that—General BUTLER.

Now, sir, I do not think this measure should be put upon false reasons. I stated yesterday what I thought were the real reasons for it. Some Senators thought I was mistaken in that, and one of them with considerable heat this morning repels the imputation that the fact that General Grant is a republican and fought on the Union side of the war has anything to do with the almost unanimous hostility to him on this side. Very well! I am bound to accept their disclaimer in that respect; but I do think that, in addition to that, they ought not to suggest that this man is a Lazarus and that it is a necessity that dogs should lick his sores. He has not applied for anything of the kind. I understand him to be a stalwart man, a man of remarkable health, a man of economy, a man who has a comfortable property, and who is now carrying on a prosperous lecturing business yielding a large return nightly. I supposed that this legislation was not a tribute cast to a beggar, that that was not to be the basis on which it proceeded, but that it recognized that a man who had a patriotic heart and a great deal of brain and a brave soul had fought upon the battle-fields of the Republic. If upon this basis this legislation was to proceed, then applying the same reasons, infinitely greater however in force, I proposed the amendment which has been adopted by the Senate, and now I am opposed to the Senate taking a step backward in that matter. You had better send this bill to the House of Representatives and see if the predictions—I infer that they amount to predictions—made by my friends that as the other House did not view the matter in a partisan aspect they will not view it still in a partisan aspect. For that reason I agree most cordially with the last remark of the Senator from Missouri. I trust the pending amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I wish to say a few calm words in regard to the situation of this question now before the Senate. I think it was a mistake to introduce the amendment embracing General Grant and placing him upon the retired list of Army officers. But that has been done. His friends have claimed that it was a proper thing to do. Whether he needed it or whether as a mark of honor, they have asked it for him, and the Senate has conceded it. We, on this side of the Chamber especially, are asking that the like honor and provision be made for General Shields. I cannot conceive that the other side of this Chamber having carried the amendment in favor of General Grant will exhibit Punic faith by voting against the bill as now amended.

The Senator from Iowa a little while ago repeated the question which he put to me yesterday: why the addition of General Grant's name should defeat this bill. I think he ought to have done me the justice to repeat my answer, which I now do. I said to him that it ought not to defeat this bill and that it would not defeat this bill by my vote. While I consider it an inappropriate and perhaps an improper thing to have brought forward this amendment in behalf of General Grant, yet it having been done and fastened upon the bill by a vote of the Senate, I certainly shall vote for the bill in its present form; and I think it an unwise thing and a mistake, after this amendment has been attached, for those who have been especially interested in behalf of General Shields to allow that to divert them from the purpose with which we started.

It is not worth while to stop and cavil about the political issues in regard to General Grant. He fills an immense space, and always will, in American history. While I was not ready to vote for the amendment, it having been placed upon the bill it certainly will not drive my vote from it. I shall vote for it as cheerfully with this amendment as without it. We are asking a favor for General Shields. General Grant's especial and political friends bring forward a like request on his behalf. The will of the Senate has been expressed. To that will I most cheerfully submit. I shall vote for the bill in the amended form, and I will regret any votes that are cast against it.

With this view I shall, of course, vote against the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. This is not a subject to be disposed of by placing General Shields on the pension-list. It is not a subject to be met in that way. After what has happened before the public eye on this subject, both in the other branch of Congress and in this, it would be a small ending of a great beginning, it would be a trifling winding up to a subject that was introduced with the blare of trumpets and the unfolding of banners. I propose to meet this legitimately, and to the end; and if the majority of the Senate, as has been expressed, desire this compliment for General Grant, I think the American people will sustain those who take the bill as amended.

Mr. BLAINE. One moment only; I will not detain the Senate. The attitude of the bill is this: the Senator from Missouri has commented with some direction upon a supposed intention of members on this side of voting to put General Grant's name on the bill with the purpose of voting against the whole bill. He excepted me from that because my disclaimer of yesterday covered it. But if a Senator on this side who has twice voted to put General Grant's name on the bill now votes for the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio he votes to strike General Grant's name out of the bill and to leave General Shields's in. It is an obliging invitation that the Senator from Ohio gives to this side. Having twice, on the yeas and nays, voted to insert General Grant's name in the bill, the Senator from Ohio now offers a motion, a little indirect it is true, but still in its effect very direct, which entirely strikes General Grant off it.

Mr. SARGENT. It strikes him entirely from the record.

Mr. BLAINE. It strikes him entirely from it. That is the whole of it. I do not know that I have any desire, as I have said, to continue the debate. But the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] has had a good deal to say, as he did yesterday, about being willing some time or other to assist General Grant if he should get into penury. If General Grant should come to absolute want, if he should be in a condition of need, then the Senator from Georgia, if he should happen to be in the Senate at that distant day, (long be it distant,) would graciously open the palm of the General Government's benevolence and aid him; although if he applied the principle that the Senator from Ohio did of the retirement of judges General Grant would never get the benefit of such benevolence, because he will never be classed among the incompetent and the lunatic and the worthless, for whose sole benefit the Senator from Ohio says the judges were to be retired. General Grant will never come in under that article; he will never be so. Therefore, taking the joint arguments of the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Georgia, I do not see even in the dimmest, remotest future the slightest opportunity for General Grant to share the benevolence of this Government. I hope this side of the Chamber at least will not oblige the Senator from Ohio by striking out General Grant's name.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Georgia is perfectly willing to stand here and say that he will wait until a man needs help before he will give it to him. The Senator from Maine is a very fast man; we all know that; and he is ready to help a man before he needs it. I say that if the position of these gentlemen were reversed, if General Grant were in the condition of General Shields, and the original bill was in favor of General Grant, who was in the condition of General Shields, and if the proposition were made to put on General Shields in addition to General Grant, I should vote against the proposition to amend. I do not vote for men; I vote for principle. I do not know what the Senator from Maine votes for; I have never been able to find out. [Laughter.] I have said over and over that I would vote for any gentleman who has rendered the services that either of these distinguished gentlemen have rendered whenever they get into a position to need it; but I am, sir, as an American Senator, willing to stand here and to be responsible to the Senate for a vote not to tax the already overburdened people of America to support a man who neither asks it nor needs it. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.] That is the principle in this bill now. Yet gentlemen on the other side keep thrusting at us General Grant. They keep endeavoring to make it appear that somebody over here is opposing the bill because General Grant's name is now in it. Have we not disclaimed it? Have we not denied it? Do not the facts sustain the denial? Why is it that gentlemen will seek persistently to represent to the country that we are opposing General Grant? Sir, I honor General Grant, as I do every other brave man who fought while the war lasted and ceased to fight when the war ended. For those who fought and fought only while there was war, the American people can never have too much respect. For those who fight and fight only in time of peace, the American people can never have too little respect. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the keepers of the galleries to the rules of the Senate. Any demonstration of applause during the discussion here the keepers will notice and remove the causes of the demonstration.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, believing the case of General Shields to be more proper for a pension than that he be placed upon the retired list, and the proposition now being to grant him a pension, and believing him to be worthy of the pension proposed, I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. I have a word to say before the vote is taken, and but a word. I said yesterday that for the bill as it came from the House for the benefit of General Shields I had made up my mind to vote, although I could not blind myself to the fact that by so doing I was in danger of aiding in setting a bad precedent; but there were certain facts connected with his case which made it an exceptional case, as was so well shown by the Senator from Missouri, and the Senator from Georgia, and the Senator from Indiana; and I therefore could subordinate for the time being my objections to the general principle of the bill and place this upon the ground that it was an exceptional case and I should vote for the bill upon its passage as it came from the House. But now it is obvious that the first section of this bill as it came from the House cannot pass the Senate without the second section. That is perfectly obvious to everybody, and placing the second section in the bill is opening the door wide for the very thing which this Government has never done and never has attempted—granting great pecuniary rewards to last for a long time, for the life of the individual perhaps, to men engaged in the military service, not on account of wounds received in battle, not on account of personal suffering, but on account of their great military ability and their great military services. It opens that door and changes the whole principle upon which this Government has heretofore acted, with perhaps the single exception of the case of General Scott, if that is an exception at all. We are brought to the question whether we shall do that thing or whether we shall increase the pension of General Shields.

That General Shields is entitled to a pension is a settled question. He has been in the receipt of a pension for I believe a long time. He was entitled under the general law to a pension. We are not legislating, therefore, a pension to a person who is not entitled to it, but my proposition is now merely to increase that pension. It is a thing that we have done again and again and again since I have been in the Senate, and that was done many a time before that. We have done it in behalf of widows, we have done it in behalf of children, we have done it in behalf of private soldiers, we have done it in behalf of wounded soldiers, we have done it by special acts, and we have done it by general acts again and again; so that the amendment which I offer is in direct consonance with the practice of the Senate and with the usage of the Government from the time there was a pension law at all.

My amendment creates no innovation; it sets no bad precedent; it creates no danger for the future; it makes no privileged class who are to receive immense pecuniary rewards, not on account of wounds received in battle or health lost in battle, but on account of great intellect and great service. In other words, my amendment leaves the principle of our pension laws to remain as it is. The House bill as now amended is the first stepping stone to adopting the principle of monarchial governments in creating a great privileged class, necessary in those countries to maintain the dignity of the throne and the dignity of an aristocracy, but totally inconsistent with the ideas of a republican government.

I have offered my amendment in perfect good faith, Mr. President. While I might be willing to give more for the benefit of General Shields than my amendment proposes, yet it is the best thing that his friends can do to accept this amendment, and it is the most likely measure to carry in his favor. Certainly, if it does not carry, we are to take the bill loaded down by setting a precedent of the most dangerous character, and one that no mortal person can foresee what will be the end of. If we are to pension General Grant in the way that the second section proposes, probably it can hardly be called a pension; but if that be done, no man here can foretell where will be the end of such laws in the future.

I have only to say this, Mr. President, in justification for offering the amendment, and I do so the more readily because several Senators yesterday who voted for the second section of the bill still said they would vote against the bill even if it were thus amended, and several expressed their willingness to vote for such a measure as my amendment proposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

Mr. WHYTE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] who is absent. I believe he votes with his colleague (the Senators from Rhode Island and Delaware always vote with their colleagues) and I shall withhold my vote.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. TELLER subsequently submitted a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected; which was entered.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3259) providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That all the territory which was ceded by the State of Maryland to the Congress of the United States for the permanent seat of the Government of the United States shall continue to be designated as the District of Columbia. Said District and the property and persons that may be therein shall be subject to the following provisions for the government of the same, and also to any existing laws applicable thereto not hereby repealed or inconsistent with the provisions of this act. The District of Columbia shall remain and continue a municipal corporation, as provided in section 2 of the Revised Statutes relating to said District, and the commissioners herein provided for shall be deemed and taken as officers of such corporation; and all laws now in force relating to the District of Columbia not inconsistent with the provisions of this act shall remain in full force and effect.

SEC. 2. That within twenty days after the approval of this act the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is hereby authorized to appoint two persons, who, with an officer of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, shall be commissioners of the District of Columbia, and who, from and after July 1, 1878, shall exercise all the powers and authority now vested in the commissioners of said District, except as are hereinafter limited, and shall be subject to all restrictions and limitations which are now imposed upon said commissioners. The commissioner who shall be an officer detailed from the Corps of Engineers by the President for this duty shall not be required to perform any other, nor shall he receive any other compensation than his regular pay as an officer of the Army. The two persons appointed from civil life shall, at the time of their appointment, be citizens of the United States, and shall have been actual residents of the District of Columbia for three years next before their appointment, and have, during that period, claimed residence nowhere else; and one of said three commissioners shall be chosen president of the board of commissioners at their first meeting, and annually thereafter; and said commissioners shall each of them, before entering upon the discharge of his duties, take an oath or affirmation to support the Constitution of the United States, and to faithfully discharge the duties imposed upon him by law; and said commissioners appointed from civil life shall each receive for his services a compensation at the rate of $5,000 per annum. The official term of said commissioners shall be three years, and until their successors are appointed and qualified; but the first appointment shall be one commissioner for one year and one for two years, and at the expiration of their respective terms their successors shall be appointed for three years. Neither of said commissioners, nor any salaried officer whatsoever of the District of Columbia, shall be accepted as surety upon any bond required to be given to the District of Columbia; nor shall any contractor be accepted as surety for any officer or other contractor in said District.

SEC. 3. That as soon as the commissioners appointed and detailed as aforesaid shall have taken and subscribed the oath or affirmation hereinbefore required, all the powers, rights, and privileges lawfully exercised by, and all property, estate, and effects now vested by law in the commissioners appointed under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, shall be transferred to and vested in said commissioners; and the functions of the commissioners so appointed under the act of June 20, 1874, shall cease and determine. And the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have power, subject to limitations herein provided, to apply the taxes or other revenues of said District to the payment of the current expenses thereof, to the support of the public schools, the fire department, and the police, and for that purpose shall take possession and supervision of all the offices, books, papers, records, moneys, credits, securities, assets, and accounts belonging or appertaining to the business or interests of the government of the District of Columbia, and exercise the power and authority aforesaid; but said commissioners, in the exercise of such power and authority, shall make no contract nor incur any obligation other than such contracts and obligations as are hereinafter provided for and shall be approved by Congress. All taxes heretofore lawfully assessed and due or to become due shall be collected pursuant to law, except as herein otherwise provided; but said commissioners shall have no power to anticipate taxes by a sale or hypothecation of any such taxes or evidence thereof, but they may borrow in anticipation of collection of revenue not to exceed in any one year $200,000, at a rate of interest not exceeding 6 per cent. per annum. And said commissioners are hereby authorized to abolish any office, to consolidate two or more offices, reduce the number of employés, remove from office, and make appointments to any office under them authorized by law: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to abate in any wise or interfere with any suit pending in favor of or against the District of Columbia or the commissioners thereof, or affect any rights or cause of action existing in favor of any citizen of the District of Columbia or any other person, but the same may be commenced or prosecuted to final judgment, and the corporation shall be bound thereby as if the suit had been originally commenced for or against said corporation. The said commissioners shall submit to the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and annually thereafter, for his examination and approval, a statement showing in detail the work proposed to be undertaken by them during the fiscal year next ensuing and the estimated cost thereof; also the cost of constructing, repairing, and maintaining all bridges authorized by law across the Potomac River within the District of Columbia, and also all other streams in said District; the cost of maintaining all public institutions of charity, reformatories, and prisons belonging to or controlled wholly or in part by the District of Columbia, and which are now by law supported wholly or in part by the United States or District of Columbia; and also the expenses of the Washington Aqueduct and its appurtenances; and also an itemized statement and estimate of the amount necessary to defray the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the next fiscal year: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as transferring from the United States authorities any of the public works within the District of Columbia now in the control or supervision of said authorities. The Secretary of the Treasury shall carefully consider all estimates submitted to him as above provided, and shall approve, disapprove, or suggest such changes in the same, or any item thereof, as he may think the public interest demands; and after he shall have considered and passed upon such estimates submitted to him, he shall cause to be made a statement of the amount approved by him and the fund or purpose to which each item belongs, which statement shall be certified by him, and delivered, together with the estimates as originally submitted, to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall transmit the same to Congress. To the extent to which Congress shall approve of said estimates, they shall appropriate the amount of 50 per cent. thereof; and the remaining 50 per cent. thereof shall be levied and assessed upon the taxable property and privileges in said District other than the property of the United States and of the District of Columbia; and all proceedings in the assessing, equalizing, and levying of said taxes, the collection thereof, the listing return and penalty for taxes in arrears, the advertising for sale and the sale of property for delinquent taxes, the redemption thereof, the proceedings to enforce the lien upon unredeemed property, and every other act and thing now required to be done in the premises, shall be done and performed at the times and in the manner now provided by law, except in so far as is otherwise provided by this act: Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $2 on every $100 of real and personal estate not exempt by law, according to the cash valuation thereof: And provided further, Upon property without the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and to be so designated by the assessors in their annual returns, the rate for any one year shall not exceed $1.50 on every $100.

SEC. 4. That the said commissioners may, by general regulations consistent with the act of Congress of March 3, 1877, entitled "An act for the support of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30 1878, and for other purposes," or with other existing laws, prescribe the time or times for the payment of all taxes and the conditions of prompt payment, and the duties of assessors and collectors in relation thereto. All taxes collected shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and the same, as well as the appropriations to be made by Congress as aforesaid, shall be disbursed for the expenses of said District, on itemized vouchers, which shall have been audited and approved by the auditor of the District of Columbia, certified by said commissioners, or a majority of them; and the accounts of said commissioners, and the tax-collectors, and all other officers required to account, shall be settled and adjusted by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department of the United States. Hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the interest on the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, when the same shall become due and payable; and he shall also create a sinking fund sufficient for the payment of the principal thereof at maturity, which he shall from time to time invest in said bonds or other securities of the United States; and all amounts so paid for interest and the creation of said sinking fund shall be credited as a part of the appropriation for the year by the United States toward the expenses of the District of Columbia, as hereinbefore provided: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed or considered as an acknowledgment of any liability on the part of the United States otherwise than as provided in the seventh section of the act of Congress entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874, and the act amendatory thereof, approved February 20, 1875.

SEC. 5. That hereafter when any repairs of streets, avenues, alleys, or sewers within the District of Columbia are to be made, or when new pavements are to be substituted in place of those worn out, new ones laid, or new streets opened, sewers built, or any works the total cost of which shall exceed the sum of $5,000, notice shall be given in one newspaper in each of the cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Washington, for one week, for proposals, with full specifications as to materials for the whole or any portion of the works proposed to be done; and the lowest responsible proposal for the kind and character of pavement or other work which the commissioners shall determine upon shall in all cases be accepted: Provided, however, That the commissioners shall have the right in their discretion, to reject any or all of such proposals. No pavement shall be accepted nor any pavement laid except that of the best material of its kind known for that purpose, laid in the most substantial manner, the total cost of which shall not exceed $3 per square yard; and good and sufficient bonds to the United States, with sureties to be approved by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, shall be required from all contractors, guaranteeing that the terms of their contracts shall be strictly and faithfully performed and that the contractors shall keep new pavements or other new works in repair for a term of five years from the date of the completion of their contracts; and 10 per cent. of the cost of all new works shall be retained as an additional security and a guarantee fund to keep the same in repair for said term, which said per centum shall be invested in bonds of the United States and the interest thereon paid to said contractors. The cost of laying down said pavement, sewers, and other works, or of repairing the same, shall be paid for in the following proportions and manner, to wit: When any street or avenue through which a street railway runs shall be paved, such railway company shall bear all of the expense for that portion of the work lying between the exterior rails of the tracks of such roads, and for a distance of two feet from and exterior to such track or tracks on each side thereof, and of keeping the same in repair; but the said railway companies, having conformed to the grades established by the commissioners, may use cobblestone or Belgian blocks for paving their tracks, or the space between their tracks, as the commissioners may direct; the United States shall pay one-half of the cost of all work done under the provisions of this section, except that done by the railway companies, which payment shall be credited as part of the 50 per cent. which the United States contributes toward the expenses of the District of Columbia for that year; and all payments shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury on the warrant or order of the commissioners of the District of Columbia or a majority thereof, in such amounts and at such times as they may deem safe and proper in view of the progress of the work: that if any street railway company shall neglect or refuse to perform the work required by this act, said pavement shall be laid between the tracks of such railway by the District of Columbia; and if such company shall fail or refuse to pay the sum due from them in respect of the work done by or under the orders of the proper officials of said District, in such case of the neglect or refusal of such railway company to perform the work required as aforesaid, the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall issue certificates of indebtedness against the property, real or personal, of such railway company, which certificates shall bear interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum until paid, and which, until they are paid, shall remain and be a lien upon the property on or against which they are issued; and if the said certificates are not paid within one year, the said commissioners of the District of Columbia may proceed to sell the property against which they are issued, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the amount due, such sale to be first duly advertised daily for one week in some newspaper published in the city of Washington, and to be at public auction, to the highest bidder. When street railways cross any street or avenue, the pavement between the tracks of such railway shall conform to the pavement used upon such street or avenue, and the companies owning these intersecting railroads shall pay for such pavements in the same manner and proportion as required of other railway companies under the provisions of this section. It shall be the duty of the commissioners of the District of Columbia to see that all water and gas mains, service-pipes, and sewer-connections are laid upon any street or avenue proposed to be paved or otherwise improved before any such pavement or other permanent works are put down; and the Washington Gas-Light Company, under the direction of said commissioners, shall take up, lay, and replace all gas-mains on any street or avenue to be paved, at such time and place as said commissioners shall direct.

SEC. 6. That a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, to serve for the term of two years, may be elected by the qualified voters of the District of Columbia, who shall have the same rights and privileges as are exercised and enjoyed by the Delegates from the Territories of the United States, and shall be ex officio a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia. He shall be a citizen of the United States and of the District of Columbia, and shall have the qualifications of a voter in said District. The Delegate first elected shall hold his seat only during the term of the Congress to which he shall be elected. The first election shall be held at such places and hours as shall be designated by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, 1878, at which shall be elected one person, whose term of office shall expire with the Forty-fifth Congress, and also at the same time and places a person to serve during the Forty-sixth Congress; and all subsequent elections shall be held and conducted at the time and in the manner as the elections of members of the House of Representatives of the United States are now conducted as far as authorized by laws of the United States. The person having the highest number of legal votes shall be declared by the commissioners to be duly elected, and a certificate thereof shall be given accordingly. And the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and required to establish not less than ten election precincts within the District, at such places as may be most convenient to the people; and said commissioners shall give thirty days' public notice, in two daily papers printed in the District of Columbia, of the time and places of holding such election, and shall designate three inspectors in each election district to conduct said election and make returns thereof to said commissioners, who shall canvass the same, and issue a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes. And said commissioners shall make all needful rules and regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of this act not inconsistent therewith.

SEC. 7. That all male citizens of the District of Columbia who shall be citizens of the United States, above the age of twenty-one years, and who shall have been actual residents of said District for two years, and of the precinct in which they shall offer to vote for six months next before the election, except such as are non compos mentis and persons convicted of infamous crimes, shall be entitled to vote for the Delegate in Congress provided for in this act.

SEC. 8. That from and after the 1st day of July, 1878, the board of Metropolitan police and the board of school trustees shall be abolished; and all the powers and duties now exercised by them shall be transferred to the said commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall have authority to employ such officers and agents and to adopt such provisions as may be necessary to carry into execution the powers and duties devolved upon them by this act: Provided, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall appoint nineteen persons, actual residents of said District of Columbia, to constitute the trustees of public schools of said District, who shall serve without compensation and for such terms as said commissioners shall fix. Said trustees shall have the powers and perform the duties in relation to the care and management of the public schools which are now exercised by and vested in the board of trustees of public schools for the District of Columbia.

SEC. 9. That the offices of sinking-fund commissioners are hereby abolished; and all duties and powers possessed by said commissioners are transferred to, and shall be exercised by the Treasurer of the United States, who shall perform the same in accordance with the provisions of existing laws.

SEC. 10. The board of health created by "An act to provide a government for the District of Columbia," approved February 21, 1871, shall be continued with the powers it now possesses, and the further powers conferred by this act. The said board shall have power to define, declare, and cause to be removed or abated nuisances injurious to health; to provide for and regulate the collection, removal, and transportation of garbage, house-offal, and dead animals in and from the cities of Washington and Georgetown in said District and their immediate and more densely populated suburbs, and to provide, by contract or otherwise, for the proper performance of such service; to make rules and regulations for all hospitals used exclusively for the isolation and treatment of persons afflicted with infectious or contagious diseases; to provide for admission to hospitals, asylums, almshouses, and infirmaries for the benefit of which appropriations are made of public moneys; to provide for transportation, in proper cases, to such hospitals, asylums, almshouses, and infirmaries; and to make such ordinances and regulations as may be necessary to carry into effect any lawful powers of the board. The said board of health shall also be charged with the care of the sick poor of the said District, furnishing medicines and medical attendance for the same, and with the burial of deceased paupers. The said board shall have power to require the draining and filling up or reducing to proper grade, as may be necessary, in their judgment, in a sanitary point of view, any lot or lots within said District: and when such necessity is found to have been occasioned by the act or neglect of the owner, the said draining, filling up, or reducing to proper grade may be done under the orders and by the direction of said board; and the expense of such draining, filling up, or reduction shall be certified to the commissioners of said District, who shall cause the same to be assessed upon the property on which said work has been done; and the amount so assessed shall be collected as other taxes are collected in the District of Columbia. And the said board shall furnish annually to the Secretary of the Treasury a detailed estimate of the expenses of the board for the ensuing year, in the form and manner as the estimates of the commissioners of the District of Columbia are herein required to be submitted. And said board shall, through the Secretary of the Treasury, submit to Congress annually a full and accurate statement of all expenses incurred in the discharge of its sanitary duties, together with a detailed statement of its operations during the preceding year, with such suggestions and recommendations as may be deemed necessary for the improvement of the sanitary service and the conservation of the public health.

SEC. 11. That it shall be the duty of the said commissioners to report to Congress at the next session succeeding their appointment a draft of such additional laws or amendments to existing laws as in their opinion are necessary for the harmonious working of the system hereby adopted, and for the effectual and proper government of the District of Columbia; and said commissioners shall annually report their official doings in detail to Congress on or before the first Monday of December.

SEC. 12. That all laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. BAYARD. I regret exceedingly that upon a bill of this importance the Senate should present such "a beggarly account of empty boxes." Here is a proposition by a single statute to arrange a government practically for this District, and we have in the Senate probably a score of Senators. I may say further, that the bill affects the rights of about one hundred and fifty thousand people who have no representative on the floor of the Senate. It seems to me that there either should be attention on the part of the Senate or a postponement of the question until there can be given proper attention to the affairs of this people.

Mr. EATON. We had better adjourn.

Mr. BAYARD. If there is no other action to be taken upon this bill than to pass it in its present shape, I shall move its postponement until a sufficient number of Senators shall be here to attend to a measure of its importance.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, as the Senate will bear me witness, I have repeatedly called attention to the fact that I should demand action upon this bill at the earliest possible opportunity. It is admitted to be a subject of very great importance as to how this community here shall be governed. Great and deserved complaint as to its government has long existed, and this is an honest attempt on the part of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia to remedy these defects and supply the omissions of existing law. I know that many Senators who desire to participate in the discussion upon this bill are temporarily absent. Several of them left the Chamber stating to me that they expected to return within a few moments. I trust that the Senator from Delaware will not invoke any action from the Senate that would result in a delay in the consideration of the bill. He perhaps more than most other Senators in the Chamber is aware of its importance. Rather than have the bill postponed to any future day I should very much prefer that a recess might be effected or that an opportunity might be given for a call for absentees in order that they might attend, for I am very sure that there is a large quorum of the body in the Capitol who would be at hand if called for.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think we can certainly go on. The Senate is as full as it usually is when we consider a bill of this character. The Senators will all be back in a few moments.

Mr. BAYARD. My object was very obvious. It simply was that upon a measure of such importance as this to the people of this District, there should be a reasonable degree of attention and diligence upon the part of those who are to vote upon a measure so full of interest to this people.

Having been in the Senate a number of years, and endeavoring to perform my duties here by giving attention to every measure before the Senate, I have been frequently made aware of the defects of the government of this District. Its position is most anomalous. It is the only portion of the American people to whom a republican form of government is denied. That which we exact from every other community organized as a State of the Union we practically deny by legislation to the people of this District. They are in no sense of the word a self-governing people, and for a long number of years past the men who have everything at stake in this District, the men of property, the men of responsibility, the men of intelligence and character of this District, have been practically excluded from the control of their own affairs. As a consequence, their affairs having been committed to those who could not know what was needed, who could not suffer for the abuses that followed, we have had more misgovernment in this District than in any other community almost in the United States.

The status of this people is not fixed. The Government of the United States owns and controls a vast portion of the real estate of the District, that is to say, of the city portion and the valuable portion. The city of Washington is not alone a depot for its local commerce and transactions, but it is the political center of the entire Union. Representatives from every State and Territory find their homes here during the sessions of Congress. The agents for the Federal Government in all its executive branches find their departments of labor here, and all persons having business throughout the United States in connection with the Federal Government must in some way or other find their way to Washington. This makes it a Federal city. It is used for Federal purposes. The occupation of the ground by those who own houses and make their permanent homes here is a mere incident to the great purpose, which is the use of this town as a center for Federal action. The result is, as far as property is concerned, that a system of expenditure has been permitted here and a system of legislation that would never have been allowed to have one year's continuous existence in any place where the people were allowed to govern their own affairs with intelligence. There have been abuses in the way of expenditure, there are to-day abuses in the way of expenditure in the District that would not be suffered to exist anywhere else. No people who were to pay such taxes and have such expenses would ever vote to lay them upon themselves, because bankruptcy, hopeless and complete, would be the necessary result.

There is one feature of this bill which I would ask the Senator having charge of it to explain. At page 6, from line 76 to line 80, is contained a proposition that the estimates for the expenses of carrying on the government of this District shall be paid in the proportion of 50 per cent. by the United States and the other 50 per cent. by the local population, the property-holders. As to the justice of that I am not sufficiently instructed. How many people in the city of Washington use these expensive avenues and streets, upon which such vast sums have been expended, and upon which such large expenditures in the future are made necessary? The term "floating population" will apply better to those who live here than in any other place of which I have knowledge. I suppose that a much larger number of those who roll so pleasantly over the smooth streets of this city are people who pay no taxes whatever in it. I do not know how many, and I do not know whether the committee have ascertained or sought to ascertain how many, of those who have all the benefits of the expenditures of this town pay no portion whatever of the expenses of the town. It is simply absurd to suppose that this little town, for that is all it is, on the borders of Maryland and Virginia can be maintained upon the scale which we now see it in, at such an expense to the local inhabitants. If it is to be, as I think it ought to be, a Federal city worthy of the great nation whose seat of government it is, then it seems to me that by far the greater portion of the expense must be borne by the Federal Government and not by the local inhabitants. Is it just that one-half of the expense of these broad avenues, of these extensive improvements, of these luxurious streets, is to be borne by the local inhabitants? It seems to me that it is unreasonable. I do not think they can bear it. There is not in this District, so far as I know, any manufacturing industry worthy of the name. So far as agriculture is concerned there is nothing here worthy of the name. The census shows a mere handful of people engaged in agriculture, and it shows a manufacturing industry less than is contained in a single block in a hundred towns that I could name in different parts of this country.

Now what is the basis upon which you are to tax? There must be wealth or there must be a productive industry that creates wealth. This town is the mere center and habitation of the employés of the Government, the clerical force of the Departments, people who are swept in and out of their offices by the ebb and flow of the power of political parties, strangers who come here during the sessions of Congress for a few days or a few weeks, or members of Congress whose interests and whose property lie entirely elsewhere.

I want to ask the honorable Senator who has charge of this bill whether it is just that the people of Washington City shall pay the proportion of one-half of this expensive government, in regard to the scale of which they never were consulted, in regard to which property that is to be taxed never was considered, or whether the fraction should not be much less. I remember in debates before to-day that in regard to the avenues and streets here there was a law, written or unwritten, which seemed in some way to be recognized, that the charge of the avenues fell upon the Government of the United States, while the keeping of the cross-streets, as I will term them, was left to the town. Then there was a proportion of about one-third of the expense which the Government assumed, and the rest was paid by the local population. But, Mr. President, that was before this system of reckless and wide-spread improvement which we have witnessed was adopted. There is no city in the United States, there is none known to me in the world, in which the same amount of expensive pavement has been laid down as in this city of one hundred and twenty-five thousand people. Instituting such a system of expensive improvement entails the expense of keeping it up. Let any man ride to-day, if he can ride, over such streets and he will see mile after mile of expensive wooden pavement in such condition of decay that the best thing would be to take it up even if it never were to be renewed. But it is intended to be renewed; it is intended to be kept in order upon the scale upon which it was started. That will entail an enormous expenditure, which, having some experience in regard to expenses of that kind, I would say the local population of Washington are totally unable to bear. The property will not bear it; it is not worth it. If it is to be paid it must be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, from which in my judgment it ought to be paid, because the laws contracting the expense and authorizing the outlay were passed without consultation with or without sufficient consideration in any way for the people whose property lies here.

I ask the honorable Senator from Kansas whether he does not consider that the proportion of one-half to be borne by the people of this District is excessive, and whether it ought not to be less even than one-fourth, justly considering the fact that the expenses of governing this town are chiefly caused for the entertainment and for the use and convenience of a non-resident population from all the rest of the Union. I believe if statistics could be established, if the number of people who pass in carriages over these streets could be polled, and their places of residence ascertained, not one resident Washingtonian out of ten would be found in the daily use of the drives and rides of this city. Is that to be so? Is it just and right that they should be called to pay one-half the expense of this scale of adornment and improvement, intended not half so much for their use and delectation as for the use of those who come here and pass away after a few weeks' stay? I submit that it is a very grave and very fundamental question in this bill, whether this equal division of the expense is just or right. In that I express my own opinion, as indicated by these unpremeditated remarks, that the proportion is too great in favor of what I may call the people of all the other States who come here and use this District as a temporary residence for a few months or a few weeks, and against those who are compelled to live here and keep it up for the use and convenience of other and absent persons.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the considerations submitted by the Senator from Delaware have great weight and have often been considered by myself and by the committee. But perhaps, in order that we may have a proper consideration of this bill, it would be well for me to make an analytical statement of the contents of the measure that was sent from the House and of the substitute reported by the committee, and that the substitute be considered by sections. If that arrangement will equally suit the Senator from Delaware, I will postpone the answer to his question until a later period of the discussion and proceed now with the statement that I suppose it is proper I should make.

Mr. BAYARD. That is perfectly satisfactory to me. Indeed I should have no objection to a postponement in the hope that more members of the Senate would be here to attend to the Senator. I would be extremely glad if the Senator from Kansas would in his own way and at his own convenience proceed with the consideration of this bill. It is not my part to criticise; I merely desire to give that attention to it which I think is fairly due to a measure of its importance.

Mr. INGALLS. Then I will proceed to state that on the 8th of May the House of Representatives sent to us a bill, No. 3259, to be entitled "An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia." This bill was referred to the appropriate committee in the Senate, and considered by them. It was found upon deliberation that the views of the House and of the Senate committee differed so materially that it was better to report an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the entire bill. It was accordingly presented to the Senate on the 16th of May and ordered to be printed, and is now upon the tables of Senators. If Senators who have the original measure before them will be pleased to give it their attention I will state, section by section, what it contains briefly and analytically, and in what respects the Senate committee have concurred in and where they have differed with the provisions that have been sent here by the House.

The first section of the House bill describes the territorial limits and area, and defines the corporate powers of the District of Columbia. I may say, in passing, that the section is strictly formal and technical, and is entirely superfluous and unnecessary, because it re-enacts the provisions of existing statutes upon those subjects. But it has been substantially adopted in the substitute reported by the Senate committee, with certain merely verbal alterations.

Mr. WHYTE. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me merely to call his attention to the fact because I happened to draw that section myself in the original bill? The reason of the re-enactment at this time grew out of the fact that the boundary contest between Maryland and Virginia was only decided during last year. The decision was that the Maryland line went to the lower shore of the Potomac River, that is, over to the Virginia shore, which had been disputed anterior to that time. Consequently it was intended to cover that case, to show that the United States territory here went over to the Virginia side of the Potomac.

Mr. INGALLS. With that suggestion it is probable my comment upon the superfluity of the section was not required. But in any event the Senate committee have substantially adopted the section as it came from the House, merely making certain verbal alterations, as I said before, to make the section conform to the language of the act of cession of the State of Maryland, with which I presume the Senator from Maryland is entirely familiar. He says he drew the first section of the bill; but as it was not strictly in accordance with the language of the act making the cession the committee thought it best to make the bill conform in that respect. Section 17 of the House bill, as it relates to the same subject, has been incorporated with section 1 in the Senate amendment.

Section 2 of the House bill provides for the creation of a board of commissioners to consist of three persons, one of them to be an officer of the Engineer Corps of the Army of a lineal rank above that of captain, to be detailed by the President for the term of three years, unless such detail be sooner revoked, and until his successor be appointed and qualified; the second of the said commissioners to be elected by the House of Representatives by ballot for the term of three years and until his successor be elected and qualified; and the third of said commissioners to be elected by the Senate by ballot for the term of three years and until his successor is elected and qualified. This section prescribes the qualifications of these officers, their official term, and the manner of filling any vacancies that may occur in the board.

The Senate committee retains the substantial features of this section with regard to the number of the commissioners, but rejects the limitation as to the rank of the engineer commissioner, because it seemed to them to be invidious and to be devised to secure the exclusion of one individual, Lieutenant Hoxie, who is now the acting engineer of the board, and who is believed by the Senate committee to be a very valuable, efficient, and excellent officer.

The committee also understand that the method of appointing these officers is defined by the Constitution of the United States. They believe that they are officers of the United States, this territory being subject to the exclusive legislative jurisdiction and control of Congress, and that they are not officers of any other portion of this country; that they are officers of the United States, and that as such they must either be appointed by the President alone, or appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, or in case of inferior officers that their appointments may be confided to the courts of law or the head of a Department. But believing that these officers come in no sense whatever within the provisions that would allow them to be thus designated, the committee have agreed to reject the provisions of the House bill as to the selection of the two commissioners from civil life, and provide that they shall be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate like other officers of the United States. The District of Columbia, being a body-corporate now by law, it seemed to be inconsistent and unnecessary to make the commissioners themselves a body-corporate. The Senate amendment, therefore, omits section 3 of the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to interrupt the Senator there. I agree with the Senator that the provision of the House bill is a defective one. It is in conflict as I believe with the Constitution to provide that officers shall be elected by the Senate and House when they are officers of the United States, and probably they should be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. I observe that the Senate committee have changed in one respect the qualification for commissioners in providing that they shall have been actual residents of this District for three years. I am now referring to the amendment of the committee, page 2, line 15 to line 20, where the section provides that—

> The two persons appointed from civil life shall at the time of their appointment be citizens of the United States, and shall have been actual residents of the District of Columbia for three years next before their appointment, and have during that period claimed residence nowhere else.

The House bill provides for an actual residence of five years with no claim of residence elsewhere. Why should a longer period be required than is required to make a man a voter in a State or in a district? If a man has identified himself with the interests of a community by becoming a property-holder in it and has obtained a fixed residence for the term of a year, I do not know any State in the United States in which he would not by that residence be qualified to be a citizen. If it would not be at this time interfering with the order of the Senator's remarks, I would move to amend that clause by requiring the commissioners to have had an actual residence for the term of one year before appointment and having during that period claimed residence nowhere else. I shall not offer the amendment now, if the Senator from Kansas would prefer that it should be postponed.

Mr. INGALLS. I should prefer that that motion might not be made now, because I would like to conclude the statement that I wish to make in regard to the general provisions of the bill. I shall then ask the Senate to recur to the first section, and consider that and the others in their order, when all these various subjects can be discussed at the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. WHYTE. I hope the Senator from Kansas will allow me just one moment.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. WHYTE. The misfortune of this bill to provide a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia is that it was prepared by a commission which was organized either by a joint resolution or by an act of the Forty-fourth Congress, and that commission took considerable trouble upon themselves to investigate this whole subject, and prepared a bill very simple in its form, but intended to cover the case as it then stood, and looking to future legislation to perfect the form of government which they had laid out; and since then, in this Forty-fifth Congress, the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House of Representatives, and I say it with great respect, not knowing exactly what was in the mind of the commission that framed the first bill, took that bill and ingrafted upon it inconsistent provisions, entirely at war with the original theory which the commission held in regard to a government for this District.

Here are two municipalities run into each other, which never was contemplated. Without going into any details and in brief, so as not to detain my friend from Kansas, I will state that the original bill provided for three commissioners who were constituted a corporation to manage the affairs of this District over the territorial area known as the District of Columbia. The last clause of the bill repealed that statute which made the District itself a municipality, and left it merely a territorial unit, and in that territory created a municipal corporation, composed of these three commissioners, to run the government. That was nothing new. It was simply going back to the original form of government which formerly existed within this District; that is, of the old levy court. There was nothing new in it. It only revived the levy court, which had three judges, and substituted three commissioners, just as we have done in Maryland. In the territorial divisions of our State known as counties we have county commissioners precisely similar to the District commissioners proposed, these commissioners being intended by the original framers of the bill to be the successors of the old levy court. Therefore there is absolute incongruity in the provision of the bill as it came from the House creating a corporation to control and manage the government and re-enacting the old clause in regard to the municipality of the District of Columbia. They are utterly inconsistent with each other.

Mr. INGALLS. That was the opinion of the committee, and, although they were not aware of the historical fact stated by the Senator from Maryland, the explanation is sufficient, I think, and will be satisfactory to the Senate that section 3 ought not to be adopted.

Section 4 of the House bill requires the two appointed commissioners to take an oath to support the Constitution and to give a bond in the sum of $50,000. As these commissioners are not the custodians of the public funds of the District, a bond appeared to the committee to be unnecessary, and they therefore have omitted it. The compensation in the House bill and in the Senate amendment remains the same, that is to say, $5,000 per year except in the case of the commissioner from the Army, who receives no compensation other than that now allowed by law for his rank.

The fifth section defines the powers of the board in relation to the property and taxes of the District, and with some verbal changes has been adopted by the Senate committee.

Section 6 creates a council of twenty-four members, who are to be citizens of the United States and of the District. It describes their qualifications and the mode of their election. They are to serve without salary and sit in legislative capacity under the usual legislative rules, to convene when notified by the board of commissioners, to have free access to the records and files of the District, to make investigations and report the result of their inquiries to Congress, to approve all contracts for public works in the District, to revise and approve or disapprove of the estimates for taxes and expenditures annually, and reduce the same if they deem it best, their action to be reported to Congress. The committee of the Senate were not able to see the necessity for the existence of such an anomalous and cumbrous and unnecessary body as this, and therefore they have concluded to reject entirely the provision of the House for the election of a council of twenty-four members, believing that it would result in a constant conflict of authority between the board of councilmen so created and the board of commissioners created and authorized by the Government, and that under the conditions of society here the election of these men would simply result in calling into constant activity the most dangerous elements and energies of society.

Instead of having estimates as provided in this section revised by the board of councilmen the Senate committee have thought best that these estimates should be revised by the Secretary of the Treasury and in their report they so provide. They suggest that they should be submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury for revision and transmitted to Congress. The final paragraph of this section is the one already referred to by the Senator from Delaware in regard to the amount to be appropriated by Congress for the annual expenditures of the District; and as this is a very important provision I will read it as our committee propose to have it stand:

To the extent to which Congress shall approve the said estimates they shall appropriate the amount of 50 per cent. thereof, and the remaining 50 per cent. thereof shall be levied and assessed upon the taxable property in said District other than the property of the United States and of the District of Columbia; and all proceedings in the assessing, equalizing, and levying of said taxes, the collection thereof, the listing return and penalty for taxes in arrears, the advertising for sale and the sale of property for delinquent taxes, the redemption thereof, the proceedings to enforce the lien upon unredeemed property, and every other act and thing now required to be done in the premises, shall be done and performed at the times and in the manner now provided by law, except in so far as is otherwise provided by this act: Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $2 on every $100 of real and personal estate not exempt by law, according to the cash valuation thereof: And provided further, Upon property without the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and to be so designated by the assessors in their annual returns, the rate for any one year shall not exceed $1.50 on every $100.

The committee have concluded that, inasmuch as the estimates are to be revised by the Secretary of the Treasury and to be approved by Congress and that no money can be raised by the commissioners or expended by them except under the strict limitations provided by this bill, it would be unwise to reserve the limitation of $1.50 on every $100 provided for in lines 199 to 202 of this section of the House bill, and have accordingly raised that amount as the maximum limit to $2 upon the $100, instead of $1.50 as provided in the House bill.

Section 7 of the House bill confers upon the commissioners the power to regulate the payment, collection, and disbursement of taxes, and is, as has already been stated, adopted by the committee.

Sections 8 and 9 provide for the payment of interest on what are known as the 3.65 bonds of the District and require the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the interest, and they also abolish the board of sinking-fund commissioners and impose the duties heretofore exercised by them upon the Secretary of the Treasury; and, with that amendment, the Senate committee have adopted the provisions of the House bill.

Sections 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 of the House bill abolish the board of health and provide a new sanitary system entirely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the system they provide, in general?

Mr. INGALLS. They provide for the appointment of a physician as health officer, to be assisted by a reasonable number of sanitary inspectors for the District and clerks to be appointed by the commissioners, defining their salaries and in an indefinite way describing their duties. But the committee had the whole subject under consideration, and after the most mature investigation that they were able to make, comparing the sanitary system here with that which exists in other great cities, they believed that the existing board of health here was one of the most valuable adjuncts of the District government; that under its administration the public health had been admirably preserved; that the death rate had been greatly reduced; that the vital statistics of the District had been kept in a remarkably efficient manner, and that all the revenue which had been awarded to them had been expended with great fidelity and great discretion and economy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What has been the average yearly cost of the board of health?

Mr. INGALLS. Somewhere from fifty to sixty thousand dollars. I can give the Senator the exact figures when I come to discuss this section of the bill under the arrangement that has been suggested.

Section 14 is a matter of detail entirely, in regard to the naming and numbering of the streets of Georgetown. It requires them to be numbered in conformity with the streets of Washington; and as it was a matter of the simplest detail that the commissioners themselves could regulate, and as there was very serious objection made to it by many citizens of Georgetown who desired to preserve intact the lineaments of their old corporation, the committee rejected it.

Section 15 of the House bill abolishes the board of Metropolitan police, the board of fire commissioners, the board of trustees of public schools, and lodges the powers now exercised by these bodies in the commissioners of the District, with which the committee of the Senate have fully concurred.

Section 16 directs the commissioners to report a draft of additional legislation, together with their official doings, annually to Congress.

Section 17, as I have before said, is incorporated in section 1 of the committee's amendment. And now, reverting to the committee's amendment, I will say that the only distinctively new provisions that have been incorporated are those contained in sections 6 and 7, which authorize the election of a Delegate in Congress from the District and define the qualifications of electors.

This completes all that I have to state upon the general subject of the frame-work and objects of the bill, and I will now ask that it may be considered section by section, and adopted or rejected by the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, this is a very important bill, and I am in this category, that I have not been able to read it carefully yet, and I know several other Senators who are in the same category. I want to study the subject, and I think that is the general disposition of the Senate, and it can hardly be done if we are to proceed with the bill this afternoon. I think we shall facilitate the consideration of the bill and save time if it goes over until to-morrow, so that we can study it to-night.

Mr. HOAR. I desire before the Senator makes any motion involving a postponement of the bill to ask——

Mr. THURMAN. I do not ask to postpone it. What I was going to suggest was this: there are some other reasons why some of the Senators who have engagements this evening desire a rather early adjournment to-day; and I was going to move that the Senate adjourn or, if it be preferred, that it go into executive session.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the Senator will submit the latter motion.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Ohio will permit me, I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas a question, which it will take but a moment to answer. Perhaps he will let me do that now in connection with the statement he has just made.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. I was going to ask the Senator from Kansas if he could state briefly, without taking too much of his time at present, the reasons which the committee have for believing that the rate of taxation prescribed in the Senate amendment, to wit, $2 on the one hundred within the limits of Washington and Georgetown, and a dollar and a half on the one hundred in the remainder of the District, will be enough to pay one-half the city expenditures and interest on the debt.

Mr. INGALLS. That was the belief of the committee; the matter was very fully investigated, and at the proper time I shall be prepared to state to the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senate the details upon this very interesting and important branch of the bill; but it is evident that unless we proceed in its orderly discussion, section by section, it will be impossible for us to get on, and I therefore suggest that the bill be considered section by section, and that it be agreed to or rejected in that way; and, as there can be no objection to the first section, which is purely formal, defining the territorial limits of the District and its general corporate powers, which are technical, I will ask that that may be agreed to now in order that the bill may be put fairly before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean by that, that it being agreed to it cannot be amended afterward?

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir.

Mr. SARGENT. It can be amended in the Senate of course.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, but amended in committee.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not mean anything but precisely what I have stated, that I should like to have it acted on section by section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should not want to have any section finally adopted in committee so that we could not go back to it, as I believe is the practice under the rules they have in the House of Representatives.

Mr. INGALLS. Oh, certainly not. That is not my intention at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection of course, and that is the natural way to read the measure through and if any gentleman has any amendment that occurs to him at the moment a section is read to offer it; but that being passed, I should not want to have anybody foreclosed.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill has been once read at length by the Secretary and I have made a statement briefly of the general provisions of the entire bill, showing what came from the House and in what respects it was agreed to or disagreed to by the Senate committee, and of course I am entirely under the control of the Senate as to the order that shall be taken; but as these provisions of the different sections are segregated, I would suggest that the orderly method would be that which I have mentioned, to take the bill up by sections.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is much more desirable; but at the same time I should wish to have all the rules observed, that if anything happens to be omitted in the mind of anybody he can go back to it.

Mr. INGALLS. That would be my understanding.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, it seems to me the suggestion made by the Senator from Kansas is the proper one: to take up the bill, consider it, and make the appropriate amendments as we go on, section by section. Nevertheless, when we have gone through the bill in that way, I take it, under the rules of the Senate, it will be amply competent for any Senator or any member of the committee to go back and still offer amendments to the part of the bill that we have just passed over; but we shall bring it more directly to the attention of the Senate in the way suggested.

Now, I am somewhat in the condition of the Senator from Ohio. I have read the bill very hastily, but I have had at one time and another a good deal to do with the legislation for this District, and I feel an interest in the matter. I want to give to the bill a little further consideration than I have time to do now. I move, therefore, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. That will leave this bill as the unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. INGALLS. To be taken up at the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. HAMLIN. It comes up, of course.

Mr. WHYTE. I want just here to ask the Senator from Maine to allow me one moment.

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. WHYTE. Some little discussion took place here in regard to the mode of appointment of these commissioners. I should like to ask my friend from Ohio, and the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, before that question is disposed of, to examine a case decided by the Supreme Court, reported in 1 Otto's Reports, Barnes vs The District of Columbia, in regard to the power of Congress to appoint these officers as they please.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 21, 1878.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. S. DOMER, D. D., St. Paul's English Lutheran church, Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHALMERS. I desire to ask unanimous consent——

Mr. WILSON. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are a number of gentlemen, who have expressed to the Chair a desire to introduce bills &c., and if there is no objection the Chair will recognize them for that purpose.

Mr. EDEN. For the purpose of reference only?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For reference, or for consideration if there is no objection.

Mr. WILSON. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CHALMERS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me——

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If the gentleman yields——

Mr. BURCHARD. I make the point that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] cannot demand the regular order and then yield to such gentlemen as he chooses to yield to.

Mr. WILSON. Then I insist upon the regular order.

Mr. REAGAN. The regular order I believe is the interstate commerce bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the unfinished business coming over from last week, being the bill (H. R. No. 3547) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to raise the question of consideration on that bill. My purpose is to go to business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That cannot be done until after the morning hour.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I desire to move to go into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is in order, and can be agreed to by a majority at any time, and is practically a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. FINLEY. Was there not an order made on Saturday that there should be a morning hour to-day?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has the same right to change its mind as any individual has.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I must insist upon my motion.

Mr. HAYES. I think that there was an understanding that there should be a morning hour this morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That may have been the understanding of the House on Saturday, but it may not be the understanding of the House to-day.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Is not the regular order this morning the morning hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then the question of consideration could be raised for the purpose of reaching that order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is entirely within the power of a majority of the House to determine with what business it will proceed. The motion of the gentleman from New York must first be put.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Allow me to make another parliamentary inquiry as to the proper form of a motion by which we can have a morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If a majority of the House should now refuse to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Army bill and should then refuse to take up the unfinished business in which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is interested, then the morning hour would be the regular order.

Mr. FORT. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not in order to move to lay aside the regular order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly it is.

Mr. FORT. I move, then, to lay aside the regular order in order that we may have a morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That cannot take precedence of the motion of the gentleman from New York. But the object of the gentleman will be accomplished if the House should refuse to sustain that motion.

Mr. REAGAN. If the House will consent to let us occupy a couple of hours with the transportation bill, we can get rid of it and get it out of the way.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to inquire whether there is any possibility of getting to business on the Speaker's table unless we have a morning hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is not. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Army bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 80, noes 71.

Mr. FORT and others called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HEWITT, of New York, and Mr. FORT were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 84, noes 75.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. Before the House goes into Committee of the Whole, I move that all general debate on the pending bill be closed in twenty minutes.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I give notice that at the proper time I shall move that general debate on this bill be closed at the termination of this evening's session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has already decided to go into Committee of the Whole; and the Chair cannot recognize the motion of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.] If the gentleman had made the motion prior to the action by which the House resolved to go into Committee of the Whole, the Chair would have recognized the motion.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield for that motion?

Mr. SINGLETON. No, sir.

Mr. MILLS. Will the Chair recognize me to test this question after the gentleman from Mississippi is through?

The CHAIRMAN. That will be a question to be determined hereafter.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Chairman, it is true of the present as of the past, that excess in one direction where the public interests are concerned is apt in the end to beget excess in the opposite direction. While true and genuine reform is often necessary, and perhaps never more so than at the present time, yet when such movements commence and become popular they always bring to the front a class of men who, anxious to win favor thereby, carry their zeal so far and push their notions of reform to such extent as to oppose measures which are for the real and substantial benefit of the country. In such times any great measure like the one I am now considering becomes a target for the arrows of all such extremists. No matter how important it may be to the country at large; no matter how valuable in developing our industrial interests or in populating our unbroken wilds; no matter how much it may increase our national prosperity in the future, all these advantages must give way to the aspirations of demagogues who seize upon public prejudices as powerful and effective weapons to defeat measures of the highest public interest, that they may retain power and place.

My views of economy are known to this House and to the country, and I will keep step with him who goes farthest to put them into practice on proper occasions and touching proper subjects, but in doing this I insist that each measure shall stand or fall according to its own merits. This rule I invoke in the case of the Texas Pacific Railroad. I ask for it only a calm and careful consideration. I insist that neither prejudices on account of ill-advised legislation in the past, nor sectional bearings, nor the influence of competing lines, nor other contending interests be allowed to enter into the decision which we are now called to make. If the measure does not commend itself to the judgment of the House upon its real merits, let it suffer defeat. I am advocating a proposition affecting not alone the welfare and interests of Mississippi, but those of a section reaching from ocean to ocean; a section embracing an area greater in extent than all that part of the United States lying east of the Mississippi River. I admit that the interests of my own State are at stake in this measure, but they are at the same time united with and bound up in the welfare of one-half of our great country.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD A NECESSITY.

A transcontinental independent competitive railroad upon or near the thirty-second parallel of north latitude, with its eastern terminus at or near Vicksburg, on the Mississippi River, and its western on the Pacific coast at San Diego, California, has now become a political, physical, and commercial necessity to the people of the United States, and however members of this House or of the Senate may from motives of economy, reasons of expediency, or feelings of sectional jealousy shrink from the contemplation and settlement of the question, it will still press for consideration until the road is built, carrying civilization and peace to the wilds and borders of our land, developing the rich resources of the country through which it will pass, and establishing a line of trade and commerce the benefits of which cannot be foretold.

A simple glance at this map which I hold up before you will suffice to show this more conclusively than all the arguments I could advance in the most labored speech. Mark this dark line running east and west from Omaha to San Francisco, like a slender thread across a vast field, and then run your eye over the area extending toward the tropics where the swift-moving train is never seen, and the shrill whistle of the engine never heard. To whom does this broad area belong? To the people of the United States, to the progressive, energetic, enlightened Anglo-Saxon race; yes, to the advanced, Americanized branch of that pushing, restless people. Is this vast section to remain untraversed by a railroad, that great commercial agent, developing power and civilization? Are these rich valleys and auriferous mountains to remain the haunts of the wild deer and grizzly bear? Are no sounds to be heard there but the howl of the wolf, and the cry of the jackal? Shall we never listen to the song of the husbandman as he shouts his harvest-home, and never see cities with their church spires pointing to heaven? Are nature's bountiful gifts in this land of flowers, of silver and gold, to be forever despised and neglected? A single glance at this map ought to arouse Congress from its lethargy on this subject and secure the passage of a bill which will push this work to completion.

But it may and doubtless will be said, that as population increases, settlements will advance; roads will be extended farther and farther until completed from shore to shore. I am fully conscious of the force of this argument and of the fact that it meets with a hearty response from those sections which have passed through and beyond the days of pioneer life, and by dint of perseverance and energy have overcome these obstacles and have provided themselves with these needed commercial agencies.

While as a general rule great works may be accomplished little by little, there are others which must be completed as a whole, and not in parts. A vast building like this Capitol may be reared wing by wing, even stone by stone, but the span of a suspension bridge, as that at Niagara, must reach from one abutment to the other, each metallic strand must extend from shore to shore. The same may be said of these transcontinental lines. Until they have developed the intermediate country their influence and value as a means of transportation depend in a large measure upon the fact that they extend from the Pacific to the Atlantic. It is evident, then, that this rule of self-expansion in this case is wholly inapplicable and unjust.

Was the road which now traverses the continent as the feeder to northern marts and for the interest and benefit of the northern half of our country built in this way? With all the wealth and resources of that section, with all the energy and perseverance of its people and the pressing need of such a line, yet private capital and private enterprise would have hesitated long to undertake it, unaided by the resources of the National Government.

There was no waiting upon the rule of self-expansion in that case, and those who use the argument do it in ignorance of its fallacy, or in a spirit of disingenuousness, which is far worse. The same facts and arguments which proved the necessity and benefits of a road for the northern section call for a similar one for the southern half of our country.

UNION PACIFIC NOT A CENTRAL ROAD.

But it is urged that the Union Pacific road is central in location and supplies all present needs of our country as a line of transportation and travel to and from the Pacific coast. Sir, a greater mistake than this could not be imagined. It is true a very large area lies north of this road and west of the Mississippi, but continue the line eastward from its terminus at Omaha and see where it runs and what section it supplies. I need not remind this House that from Omaha eastward, being the direct route to the city of New York, it traverses the extreme northern portion of our country, running close at some points to the boundary, and at no point reaching south of the forty-first parallel of north latitude. Can such a line as this be counted in any sense as central? To call it such is a perversion of terms. It is locally, commercially, and in every other sense a northern and only a northern line.

If a resident of Charleston, South Carolina, shall start to travel to the Pacific coast, he is compelled to travel northward directly or indirectly five hundred miles before he reaches the latitude of this line of transit, and from my own State the distance is even greater, while the citizen of New Orleans must proceed directly northward fully one-third of the entire distance to the Pacific coast before touching this road. Can a line located as this be called in any sense a central route, equally adapted to the wants of all the States east of the Mississippi? The absurdity of the proposition is demonstrated the moment you cast your eye upon the map of the United States. The area east of the Mississippi lying north of this line is only about two hundred and eighty-seven thousand square miles, while that south of it is five hundred and eighty-seven thousand square miles, or a little more than double the former.

But while I am upon this part of the subject I desire to call attention to the following very significant fact: in the report of the Commissioner of Public Lands, which I hold in my hand, I find on page 78 a table giving a statement by States and Territories of the number of miles of railroad which have been built under the land grant system, as follows:

States and Territories.	Miles.
Illinois	705.72
Missouri	703.00
Alabama	782.00
Mississippi	406.00
Louisiana	152.00
Michigan	1,005.00
Arkansas	555.00
Florida	247.00
Iowa	1,587.00
Wisconsin	503.00
California	1,634.59
Minnesota	1,745.00
Oregon	227.00
Nevada	460.00
Nebraska	832.00
Kansas	1,654.00
Utah Territory	253.00
Dakota Territory	196.00

States and Territories.	Miles.
Colorado	298.00
Wyoming Territory	460.00
Indian Territory	155.00
Washington Territory	106.00
Texas (where there are no public lands)	342.87
Total	14,344.18

This shows that out of 11,168 miles of road constructed under the land-grant system in the States and Territories west of the Mississippi only 1,701 are in the area south of the Kansas line, or only about 15 per cent. of the whole amount, giving only one mile of road thus constructed to every 417 square miles, or one mile to 266,880 acres of land. North of this line and west of the Mississippi, in a country with a population almost equally sparse, there has been constructed under this system one mile of railroad to every 151 square miles, or one mile for every 96,640 acres. An equal ratio in the southern section would give us about 4,700 miles of railroad, or more than three times that which is demanded. I do not mention these facts by way of complaint on account of what has been done toward developing one section, but to bring into strong contrast the neglect of another.

Every member of this House is fully aware of the rapid growth in population and prosperity of the Western States in this northern section, through the influence of these railroads, a growth unparalleled in the history of our country and which seemed to be without check or hinderance until the locusts sweeping down their hordes from the mountain regions seemed to stay the progress for a time. I look at this prosperity with pleasure and pride, but at the same time I think justice, wisdom, and the best interests of our whole country demand that the same stimulus to activity and progress should be applied to the southern section of the great West.

Aside from numerous other good reasons which could be urged why a southern, independent, competing, transcontinental road should be built, and why the United States Government should aid and encourage it, I may name four, either of which in itself is sufficient to justify such action. These I shall now proceed to discuss.

EXTENT OF TERRITORY TO BE DEVELOPED BY THIS ROAD.

The first is the vast extent of territory in the interior of the western portion of the country which can be developed only by such a measure as this.

This point I have already adverted to in general terms, but I desire now to call attention more especially to the amount of territory which can by this means be developed, and which otherwise will remain useless and unproductive for generations to come. In order to impress this point more fully upon the minds of members I again call attention to the map which I have had prepared, showing the vast extent of country through which such a road will pass and which is now without any adequate means of transportation or travel. A glance at this map shows that all of Western Texas, all of New Mexico, Arizona, Southern Nevada, Southern Utah, and a large portion of Northwestern Mexico would be tributary to such a road, an area nearly or quite half a million of miles in extent.

I know that highly colored pictures and overwrought descriptions of this and other western regions by interested parties and romantic travelers have been sent broadcast over the country and which correct information is now dispelling; but, on the other hand, the statement that all this vast country is sterile and useless is still further from the truth and does great injustice to the West. I have no intention of appealing to such imaginary descriptions to influence the judgment of this House or of claiming that this or any other country is a modern Paradise. But when such statements are made as that in all this broad area there is not as much arable land remaining as a good sized county in Wisconsin, I resent it as an insult to our intelligence and a libel upon the great West. That some sections in this immense area are more or less sterile and not adapted to agriculture is undoubtedly true, but it is wholly an erroneous opinion that this is only a mining region.

The fertility of Texas at the eastern and of California at the western extremity of the proposed route is proverbial, no State in the Union being capable of producing heavier or more valuable crops than these. The valleys of New Mexico, Arizona, and the bordering States of old Mexico, as Chihuahua and Sonora, are exceedingly productive, when irrigated or when the supply of moisture is sufficient. The wheat of these sections equals in quality that of California, Utah, and Colorado, which is esteemed perhaps the best grown on American soil; and, what is of the utmost importance, these sections can produce all that will ever be required to supply their own population, including that of the mining districts. The governor of Arizona, in his message of 1876, alludes with pride to the fact that the supply of this and other necessary products in that Territory exceeded the demand for the year previous.

Corn is the staple product of the older inhabitants of this section and of Mexico; it is grown readily, and in some parts it is even possible to procure by proper attention two crops in one season. The only reason why we have never had the productiveness of the arable and irrigable sections of this region brought more into notice is that it has been occupied by a semi-civilized population, with few or no ideas of progress. Oats, barley, rye, peas, beans, and other food crops grow remarkably well and are very productive. But one fact in relation to the agriculture of this region should not be forgotten, as it is worthy of note. While it is true there are large sterile areas which produce a very dry atmosphere throughout that region, yet this very thing in that subtropical latitude renders the arable sections capable of producing the very growth that will not flourish in the more humid and northern sections of the eastern parts of the United States. It thus becomes in an agricultural sense a complement to the other portions of the Union, and if we include in our estimate the adjoining sections of old Mexico, which would undoubtedly become tributary to a southern railroad such as this bill contemplates, we shall find the list of valuable productions much enlarged.

From New Mexico to California the peach, nectarine, apricot, plum, grape, pear, and all fruits of this kind can be produced with a luxuriance and flavor unknown in any other part of the Union. No part of the continent can excel it in grapes and wine.

But in order that you may have a more correct idea of the variety of growths of this semi-tropical area, I quote the following from Johnson's Universal Encyclopedia, (III, page 456, article "Mexico,") in reference to the productions of that country, nearly all of which can be grown in the area tributary to the Texas Pacific Railroad if carried near our southern border:

Vegetation and agriculture.—There are one hundred species of timber trees and cabinet woods, seventeen oil-bearing plants and trees, twelve species of dye-woods, eight gum trees, and over sixty medicinal plants. Indian corn, the staple, wheat, and barley grow to perfection in the central valleys, especially in Guanajuato, (Gwah-nah-whah'-to;) rice, sugar-cane, tobacco, cotton, coffee, cocoa, and indigo in the tierras calientes, (warmer sections,) and tierras templadas, where oranges, lemons, olives, mangoes, bananas, pine-apples, grapes, sweet-potatoes, yuccas, &c., flourish.

If to them we add ten and several species of nuts and fibers, which can probably be grown, the importance of a road which would develop these new industries becomes so apparent that none can fail to see it.

It is therefore wholly a mistaken idea, entertained by many, that this entire region is without any agricultural value. The following official letter from the Commissioner of Agriculture will not only confirm what I have said, but will even increase the list of articles given:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, February 9, 1878.

Hon. O. R. SINGLETON:
House of Representatives:

I have received yours of the 5th instant, requesting such information as the Department may have respecting the resources and character and the agricultural and other products of Northern Mexico.

The Department is in possession of no specific information as to the agricultural or other resources, or the general character of the northern states of Mexico, with which it has had but an occasional correspondence, with which, in fact, our country has very little intercourse, and concerning which there are so few descriptive documents or published works. We know that the mineral resources of some of those states—particularly Chihuahua, Sonora, and Durango—are extensive, including gold, silver, copper, &c., but that a general depression prevails in that branch of industry. There are few or no American mining companies in successful operation, and Mexicans are engaged in mining on a small scale only, through want of capital and machinery.

As to agricultural resources, we only know that wheat, corn, cotton, and tobacco are the principal productions; but that scarcely anything is raised for exportation or beyond the necessity of home consumption. Fruits of all kinds are said to grow well, but to be produced to a very limited extent only. The greater portion of the country is susceptible of cultivation, and much of it is particularly adapted to stock-raising; but some of the best portions are as yet unsettled.

There is very little traffic with the United States, and very few American merchants in the country. European goods are placed in the markets at cheaper rates than American goods can be. Trade is monopolized by German merchants with imported English and German merchandise.

A consul of the United States in the state of Sonora in a recent communication states that wheat is admirably adapted to the soil of that state, yielding thirty to forty bushels to the acre, of excellent quality; that corn yields well; that barley and oats grow excellently, and that the sugar-cane is admirably adapted to the soil, especially on the extensive bottoms of the Yaqui River. The pastoral facilities, he says, are extensive and excellent, but there has been no improvement on the old manner of tending and raising crops.

Railroad facilities of communication are demanded for the relief of the present generally depressed state of the country, and for opening commercial intercourse with the United States.

Very respectfully,

WM. G. LE DUC, Commissioner.

Here, too, is undoubtedly one of the best wool-growing sections in the Union; not only is the pasturage admirably adapted to this purpose, but the natural curing of the grass on the ground makes winter-feeding almost wholly unnecessary. The pure, dry atmosphere forms a perfect indemnity against foot-rot and like diseases, which sometimes play sad havoc with flocks in older and moister States.

The sterile districts along the line of the Union Pacific, through the impetus to emigration by its construction, are gradually being encroached upon, and areas heretofore supposed to be beyond redemption now bear their rich crops of golden grain and are dotted with happy homes. Let a road be constructed through the southern area and there is no doubt but the effect would be far more marked and rapid, as there is no mountain belt five hundred miles in width intervening. Already settlements in anticipation have preceded the construction of this road in Texas. Intelligence, science, and energy will bring into action dormant power now useless and almost unknown.

EFFECT OF THIS ROAD UPON OUR RELATIONS WITH THE REPUBLIC OF MEXICO.

A second reason why a road through this section should be built is the very important bearing it would have upon our relations with our immediate southern neighbor, the Republic of Mexico.

The contemplated route runs near the boundary separating the territory of these two nations, which at present is neither crossed nor approached by a single mile of railway; a boundary which for a quarter of a century has been proverbial for disturbances by our restless neighbors and roving tribes of Indians, and which has been the source of more annoyance, trouble, and expense to our Government than all the rest of our national boundary. A line marked only by the surveyor's compass or a narrow stream separates two widely different populations and grades of civilization which must ultimately meet here and come in contact with each other.

Already the effect of this contact is being felt. We may try to account for the disturbances along the Texan border by the remembrance of past events, lawless bandits, and desire of plunder, but behind all these lies the real cause, the difference in the civilization, the progress, and energy of the people on the two sides of this dividing line; and so long as the two remain ununited by the ties of commerce and mutual profit will these disturbances continue.

If this southern line were placed on a basis which would insure its completion it is certain that long before this could be accomplished branch lines running southward into Mexico, some of which are already projected, would be constructed, thus uniting the two countries by commercial ties which would prove more efficacious in suppressing disorder than all the forts which can be established along this international boundary. It requires no prophetic vision to foretell the result of constructing such roads leading from the heart of one nation to that of the other. Along these would soon be gathered a thriving, active, business population, infusing life, energy, and prosperity into all the adjoining region, and now where brigandage, disorder, and dissension rule and murder and robbery are of common occurrence, peace and harmony would prevail.

There is no agency which has greater effect in uniting in peaceful relations diverse populations than commerce, and where water facilities for this purpose are wanting, railroads and telegraphs are the only adequate means of such commerce and intercourse.

Instead of spending millions a year in maintaining a standing army and in constructing forts along this extended boundary for protection, it would be wise policy to put these millions into this railroad and push thither as speedily as possible this great civilizer.

Mr. Chairman, the engine, with its shrill whistle, speeding its way across the Rio Grande, from the prairies of Texas to the land of Montezuma, bearing as its ensign the American flag, and dropping its pioneer husbandmen, artisans, and mechanics at every station along its route, would do more toward quelling our border troubles and securing a permanent peace with Mexico than all the brilliant victories of 1846 and 1847. But, sir, this course would not only result in benefit to our own citizens, but would ultimately bring to an end the political troubles of that unhappy people of Mexico so long cursed with internal wars and constantly recurring revolutions.

Some northern politicians, especially the Maine stripe of republicans, are strongly opposed to a war with Mexico for any cause whatever, lest it should result in an acquisition of territory to be given over to southern influence and civilization, thereby increasing its power in Congress and in national politics. The most effectual antidote to this dreaded result is to push forward this great commercial and civilizing agency, thus securing a permanent peace between these two republics.

EFFECT OF THIS ROAD UPON OUR INDIAN TRIBES.

The effect of this road with its branches upon the Indian problem is too well known to need extended notice. Wherever these roads penetrate the Indian country so that troops can be easily massed at any given point, it secures peace so far as they are concerned. They are only troublesome and dangerous in localities away from these great thoroughfares where the population is sparse and no troops are found.

This may be regarded as a matter of secondary consideration, yet it is of sufficient importance to be taken into account by Congress in deciding this question. Allegiance upon the part of the citizen to government carries with it the correlative obligation of protection on the part of that government to his person and property. If this has to be done ri et armis, how necessary then that it be done expeditiously and effectively. This railroad will enable the Government to meet its obligations in this respect at the proper time and at a greatly reduced cost by means of ready transportation of supplies, men, and munitions of war to the point of outbreak.

MINING INTERESTS TO BE DEVELOPED BY THIS ROAD.

A third reason why this road should be built, and why the United States Government should aid and encourage it, is on account of the vast mining interests which it would develop and foster.

It is evident from the map which I have exhibited that a road on or near the thirty-second parallel of latitude, judiciously located, would form the line of transportation and travel not only to the States and Territories through which it would pass, as Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California, but also to Southern Nevada, Southern Utah, and the northern states of old Mexico. As soon as the main line would be completed, short lateral lines would be built by private enterprise just as lateral branches are being extended from the main line of the Union Pacific. In estimating, therefore, the mining sections and interests which would be affected, we must include all in the area named, where the southern road would be more easy of access than any other one now constructed. The comparative freedom from large mountain masses along the southern route will render it much easier of access from lateral points than is the case with the Union and Central Pacific roads.

Another fact is to be taken into consideration in estimating the importance of this road in reference to these precious and other metals, which is this: it is not alone the quantity of these metals now drawn from the mines which makes the road a necessity, but that which is left unmined for the want of facilities for transportation. I am aware that it is difficult to arrive at even an approximate estimate of the value of the metals and minerals in these mines, but I think there are facts sufficient to show beyond controversy that the mineral wealth of the region which would be tributary to this road would be equal to that tributary to the one already built.

In the first place, it would evidently lay under contribution a large share, if not a moiety of the mining interests of California, a large portion of those in Nevada, all in Arizona and New Mexico, whatever there may be in Southern Utah, and all in Northern and Northwestern Mexico.

In his Mineral Resources West of the Rocky Mountains for 1876, Mr. Raymond makes the following statement in reference to mining operations in New Mexico:

> The small progress of mining in this Territory is due to its remote position and imperfect communication; the indolence or indifference of the Mexicans and half-breeds, constituting the larger part of its population. * * * *
> There is a large area of auriferous alluvium in the Territory; its resources in copper are remarkably extensive; large veins of galena characterize several of the mining districts, and the supply of coal is both abundant and excellent. As yet, however, no quartz mines, whether of gold or silver, have been successfully worked for long periods since the days when Maxwell's ranch and the Ortiz mine grant were under active development. The recently developed silver districts contain many deposits of the character of pockets or chambers and much base metal.

Yet notwithstanding all these drawbacks, the estimate for 1875 is as follows:

Silver bullion	$225,000
Gold-dust	95,000
Gold and silver ore shipped out for reduction	5,000
Copper and a small quantity of pig-lead	74,915
Total for 1875	399,915

This amount, it is true, is not very large, but when it is taken in connection with the fact that it has been realized without any means of transportation, of working ores or quartz mining, and that the greater part of the mines are lying idle on this account, it is evident that with the means of introducing proper machinery and of transporting ores, the mining production would soon be increased ten or twenty fold.

In Arizona, although undoubtedly one of the richest mining districts of the Union, the case is still worse, as shown by the following extract from the same work:

> But the peaceful condition of the country, with all its attendant advantages, and the value of many of the mines, (which is no longer a question of doubt,) are not sufficient to overcome the need of cheap and quick transportation, which, next to the Indian troubles, has ever been the serious drawback to the rapid settlement and profitable development of this remote Territory.
> The past year has witnessed an increased attention to mining and the investment of some new capital, but the distances, both from the Pacific and the Atlantic States are such and many of the roads to the mineral districts are so heavy or rough that no expeditious and economical movement of ores, machinery, or miners, no working or shipment of low-grade ores, and no influx of capital (even from California) can be looked for, and consequently no extensive or very important operations can be carried on until at least a trunk railroad crosses the Territory.
> At present only such gold and silver lodes as would elsewhere be considered surprisingly rich can be worked to advantage, and scores of lodes that would pay handsomely in California or Colorado are utterly neglected, while the great copper interests of the Territory (for copper is nowhere more abundant or of greater purity) are for all practical purposes without value.

The mines already discovered in this Territory are so numerous that the writer, from whom I have just quoted, does not attempt to describe but a few of the more important; but most of these must remain undeveloped until some means of transportation is obtained. The estimated yield for 1875 is $750,000, which will soon be multiplied many times when a railroad penetrates to that section.

How much of the products of Nevada would flow along this new line I cannot say, but certainly all of that from the southern section.

The whole amount produced in the State in 1875 is reported as follows, (Raymond's report for 1876, page 132:)

Gold dust and bullion by express	$196,858
Gold dust and bullion by other conveyances	$19,605
Silver bullion by express	35,283,103
Ores and base bullion by freight	4,978,633
Total	40,478,369

The total production of gold and silver in the United States in 1875 is estimated by Mr. Raymond as follows, (Report 1876, introduction, page 6:)

California	$17,753,151
Nevada	40,478,369
Idaho	1,750,000
Oregon and Washington	1,246,978
Montana	3,573,600
Utah	3,137,688
Colorado	5,302,810
New Mexico	325,000
Arizona	450,000
All other sources	500,000
Total	74,517,596

Of this we may fairly claim as tributary to a southern road the following:

California	$8,000,000
Nevada	10,000,000
New Mexico	325,000
Arizona	750,000

This total will be the amount to commence with from mines in the United States without taking into account the largely increased development which will follow the construction of this road.

It is very difficult to obtain any reliable information in reference to the mines of old Mexico and their production, a very large portion of the estimates given being so highly colored that I have felt unwilling to introduce them, as I propose to deal in facts which will bear the closest scrutiny, satisfied of their sufficiency to establish the proposition which I set out to prove.

I find by reference to Appleton's condensed encyclopedia, (and also in Appleton's Annual for 1876, page 542, article "Mexico,") the following facts:

The seven principal mines of San Luis Potosi alone produced in 1868 silver to the value of $2,176,899. That the state of Sinoloa is literally covered with silver mines. In 1870 there were in Oajaca eighty-three silver and forty gold mines. In Sonora, which lies adjacent to the proposed road, there are one hundred and forty-four mines, chiefly yielding gold, besides five hundred and eighty-three in which, though productive, the works are suspended. Tin is abundant in some sections, and copper is also common, and lead is found in most of the silver mines. There were in 1876 eleven mints in the Mexican Republic, coining on an average $20,000,000.

The exports in 1873 of the produce of mines were as follows:

Silver coin	$22,602,493
Solid silver	1,512,616
Gold coin	640,270
Solid gold	288,578
Ores and mineral earths	222,854
Silver amalgam	39,251
Lead	30,831
Copper	17,137

Surely this is a prize worth contending for, and one which our Government ought by all proper means to strive to obtain for her citizens. There is no good and valid reason why the United States should not have the great share of this trade. But what are the facts in reference to it?

The total exports of Mexico in 1873 were valued at $31,791,150. Of these Great Britain received $12,000,000, the United States $11,000,000, and France $4,500,000. The imports amounted the same year to $20,852,406. Of these Great Britain furnished $10,000,000 worth, the United States $7,000,000, France $5,000,000, and Germany $4,000,000.

I ask, Mr. Chairman, whether it is a wise policy that allows trade thus to be taken away from our very doors. The effect of railroad communication between the two republics in changing the current of this trade would soon be manifest, not only in the carrying trade of the road itself, but in introducing the manufactures and products of our country, both by land and water, and thus causing an interchange of commodities.

I cannot but feel that our Government has been unwise in this matter and that politics and sectional jealousies have been allowed to govern our actions too long. Instead of using the only proper means of forming a lasting and binding peace and friendly commercial relations we have been driving away from our marts a most important trade that we might have secured, and spending millions in guarding a line where there should be no more need for it than along the Canada boundary.

HOW FOREIGN TRADE WOULD BE AFFECTED BY THIS ROAD.

The fourth and last general reason which I shall urge in behalf of Government aid in the construction of this road is the bearing it would have upon trade with foreign countries on the Pacific side of our continent. The value of this is not limited by its effects upon local interests; it is not simply for the purpose of inciting trade and travel between sections of our own country, but, if built, is destined to become one of the great routes of the world, and one of the leading thoroughfares between the nations on the Pacific and Atlantic hemispheres.

The distance from San Diego to the Pacific Islands, to the East Indies, and to the Asiatic countries, as Japan, China, &c., is no more than it is from San Francisco, and in some instances less, especially since it is true that vessels going west from San Francisco are compelled to run almost due south along our Pacific coast nearly to the latitude of San Diego before they can head for any of the countries in Asia. This is done that they may avoid the trade-winds blowing from west to east in the latitude of San Francisco. From San Diego west there is what is termed the calm belt and it is to reach this that vessels steer south as stated above.

So far as all the countries along the western coast of South America are concerned the Texas Pacific would have decidedly the advantage, so much so in fact that it would monopolize all that portion of trade and travel passing eastward by overland route.

In order to convey a correct idea of the importance of this road as a carrying line of foreign traffic and travel, I call attention to the following figures from the report issued from the Bureau of Statistics for 1876, page 82:

Imports from Pacific countries in 1876.

From Chili	$735,229
From China	12,360,851
From Hong-Kong	493,090
From Japan	15,508,170
From Mexico	12,505,753
From Peru	1,440,973
From Sandwich Islands	1,382,592
Total	44,447,251

Exports to Pacific countries in 1876.

To Chili	2,159,752
To China	1,390,360
To Hong-Kong	9,167,702
To Japan	1,098,457
To Mexico	4,706,778
To Peru	1,176,992
To Sandwich Islands	754,267

Adding these two items together, we have as the total value of the articles passing to and from these countries $64,899,489, or in round numbers about $65,000,000. A large portion of this, it is true, goes by water from the western side to the eastern ports and marts, but as means of more rapid transportation is made available the current changes from the tedious and circuitous water route to that which is more expeditious.

There can be but little doubt that this would also be the principal transcontinental line of travel, as it passes through the most salubrious climate in the Union and will never be blockaded by the snows of winter, as the more northern roads are.

Mr. Chairman, I have said all I think necessary to be said as to the general utility of this road. The only remaining inquiry is, how is this road to be built? I answer, under the provisions of the Stephens bill as modified and reported by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, or some other bill containing like provisions.

In order to judge properly of the merits of said bill, it may be well to inquire, in the first place, what are the objects contemplated by it and what the means by which these objects are to be accomplished, and, in the second place, what amount of responsibility the Government assumes in giving the proposed aid to this road and what dangers there are of ultimate loss to the Government.

OBJECTS OF THE BILL AND HOW TO BE CARRIED OUT.

In reading this bill its first grand object seems to be to secure to the public a transcontinental railroad upon or near the thirty-second parallel of north latitude, which shall forever remain an independent competitive line. And as a guarantee that it shall so continue a provision is contained in the bill that whenever it ceases to be such, whenever it enters into any combination with any other transcontinental line to defeat this object, a forfeiture of its charter with all its franchises is to be the result. But to insure still further this point and to give to the Government and people the benefits of cheap transportation and travel upon this road the Government retains to itself in said charter the primary use of it for postal, telegraph, and military services, the compensation for which to be agreed upon by the officers of the road and the Secretary of War, Secretary of the Interior, and Postmaster-General, but not to exceed rates paid by private parties for similar services, and the Government further retains absolute and unlimited power to fix the rates of freight and travel over the whole line so far as the public is concerned.

Other or further guarantees upon this point ought not to be demanded, nor do I see how they could be given. The people through their Representatives will have full power to hold this road in check, and if it shall prove contumacious to repeal its charter and confiscate its property.

Another grand object of this bill seems to be to secure the aid of the Federal Government in the construction of the road without subjecting that Government to inconvenience or loss. For this purpose the bill authorizes the company to execute and deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States construction bonds at the rate of $20,000 per mile for the distance of eleven hundred and fifty miles, and $35,000 per mile for the remaining distance of two hundred and fifty miles, (through a mountainous region,) said bonds to mature in fifty years and bear 5 per cent. per annum interest, the Government to guarantee payment of said interest to the maturity of said bonds and no longer, the whole amount of said bonds not to exceed $38,750,000; and of this amount only $31,750,000 to be available for the construction and equipment of the road and the balance, $5,000 per mile of the whole road, to be held by the Treasurer of the United States and to be sold at any time when necessary to pay accrued interest on these bonds which has not been met by the company.

It must be remembered that these bonds are not to be issued in bulk to the company, but whenever ten consecutive miles of said road are completed, examined, and approved by a commission to be appointed by the President of the United States, and the actual cost of construction and equipment ascertained, bonds to the amount of said cost are to be issued to said company, but in no case to exceed the amount named per mile.

It is expressly provided that no aid is to be given to any branch road, but the whole amount of the proceeds of these bonds is to be expended in a trunk line of fourteen hundred miles from Fort Worth, Texas, to San Diego, California. The bill further provides that said company shall, at its own cost and without the aid of the Government or its guarantee in any manner, build from some point of its four hundred and forty-four miles now completed, from Fort Worth east, a line of road to some point on the Mississippi River, not farther north than Memphis, Tennessee, the terminus on the Mississippi to be decided upon by a commission of five persons to be appointed by the President of the United States; and further, all connecting lines to be allowed the same privileges, facilities, and rates for travel and transportation as the trunk road, thus guarding against extortionate rates and unjust and tyrannical discriminations on the part of the trunk line against connecting branches.

I have thus briefly attempted to bring before this House the objects contemplated by this bill and the means proposed to effectuate these objects. It now remains to show how far the Government is indemnified against any loss which might result from its guarantee of the interest of these bonds; for, be it remembered, the Government does not guarantee the payment of one dollar of the principal of said bonds.

GOVERNMENT FULLY INDEMNIFIED AGAINST LOSS.

In the first place the company is to release to the Government all right, title, claim, and interest in and to eighteen million acres of land heretofore donated to it in aid of the construction of said road; said lands to be opened at once for sale and settlement upon such terms as the Government shall prescribe, and when sold, or as fast as sold, one-half the proceeds to be applied to the payment of the guaranteed interest upon said bonds, should any part of same remain due and unpaid by said company.

To the dullest intellect it must be manifest that should said lands be greatly enhanced in value by the construction of said road they will go far toward indemnifying the Government against any possible loss.

In the next place a first-mortgage lien is to be executed to the Government upon the whole line of said road and upon all its franchises, property, and rolling-stock. So that as the Government's liability shall increase by issuing bonds for every ten miles constructed, in the same ratio will increase the value of the security given.

Again, the company is to transport on said road, upon the requisition of the Government, if need be to the exclusion of all other freights and passengers, the mails, troops, supplies, and munitions of war of the Government, and said Government to use its telegraph lines at will, the compensation for which, amounting to many thousands annually, to be retained in the United States Treasury to meet the accruing interest upon said bonds.

And yet again the whole net earnings of said road are pledged for the payment of said interest, and, as stated above, for every mile of said road $5,000 of said bonds, executed as aforesaid, are to be retained by the Treasurer of the United States, and in default of payment of interest by the company these bonds are to be sold and the proceeds to be applied to such payment.

One word as to the net earnings of said road, the amount of which is to be arrived at by a comparison with the net earnings of that part of it already in operation from Fort Worth east toward the Mississippi River, and from a further comparison with the net earnings of the Union and Pacific roads. From the Texas Pacific as it shall be hereafter constructed it may be safely assumed that the net earnings per mile will be equal to those of the Union and Pacific roads; and by their reports these appear to have been between $5,000 and $6,000 per mile per annum. Now, assume that the Texas Pacific shall cost upon an average $26,000 per mile, and the interest at 5 per cent. shall be upon that sum $1,300 per annum. Then, upon the hypothesis that its net earnings per mile per annum shall be $5,000, all interest can be paid out of that sum, and leave to the company of its net earnings $3,700 per mile per annum.

But as perhaps a more suitable comparison, and to shut out all cavil, let us take the net earnings of that part of the Texas Pacific now constructed and in operation. From its reports, notwithstanding it runs to no commercial point, giving it the benefit of through traffic and travel, notwithstanding it penetrates an undeveloped and sparsely populated country, it will be found that its net earnings during the last year amounted to $2,000 per mile, and calculating that the balance of said road when constructed will yield a like net income, this sum will pay the interest, $1,300 per mile per annum, and leave an unexpended balance to the company of $700 per mile.

Now, sir, with all these securities in the hands of the Government, namely, eighteen millions of acres of land with title undisputed; with a first mortgage upon the whole road, its property, and franchises; with a right to use the road ad libitum by the Government in transporting its mails, troops, supplies, and munitions of war, the compensation for which to be retained by Government; with the right to apply the net earnings of the whole road for its protection against loss; with $5,000 of bonds per mile subject to sale for payment of interest; with power to regulate the rates of travel and transportation, I ask what risk does the Government take in guaranteeing the interest upon these bonds? Could it be more fully protected against loss? Could better security be offered? Why insist upon calling this a subsidy, when not a dollar is asked for out of the Treasury and when it is morally certain that not a dollar of loss will fall upon the Government.

If gentlemen are determined to vote against this bill from feelings of sectional jealousy or personal animosity, let them say so, and not hold out false pretenses that detriment may come to the Government. If they favor a monopoly in the hands of certain parties because they are millionaires, let them proclaim their willingness to bow at the shrine of Mammon. If any member upon this floor is stricken with a virtuous fit of constitutional scruples, let him remember the land grants, subsidies, exclusive privileges, exemptions, and all manner of favors bestowed upon other roads, and that no court has ever interposed to stay the hand of Congress and save the people from these unconstitutional acts. Too long have the people acquiesced in these grants, aids, and subsidies, too often have the courts sanctioned them, to flaunt the Constitution in our faces at this late day.

BRIEF RECAPITULATION.

But, Mr. Chairman, my time is exhausted, and I shall only give a brief résumé and bring my remarks to a close.

Here is an area within our own national bounds, equal in size to Germany and France combined—an area large enough to make ten States, each the size of New York, and yet in which there is not a single mile of railway.

Not only this, but adjoining it on the south is another section, equal in extent, in which the sound of a railroad engine has never been heard; a country capable of producing in abundance those semi-tropical products we so much need, and yet not an effort has been made by the Government to develop or utilize it; a country abounding in mineral wealth, which is estimated to have produced since 1848 over $1,000,000,000, ($1,389,000,000,) and which as yet has but partially developed its immense mineral resources, and still we as a nation are making no adequate effort to seize the grand prize.

While hundreds of thousands of our people are wandering through the land and playing the rôle of tramps and beggars, we are neglecting the grand opportunity offered us of opening up to them new channels of employment, industry, and wealth.

Here is a boundary line which is a continual source of annoyance and heavy expense, where an army has to be maintained and forts built to preserve a doubtful peace, and although the remedy is at hand which would soon unite two republics in the bonds of commercial unity and secure a lasting peace, yet we fail to use it.

We behold the isles of the sea, but lately bound in the fetters of barbarism and savage life, bursting their fetters and rising rapidly into civilized life and active industry; we see the nations of Eastern Asia waking from their long sleep and rising rapidly in the scale of civilization; their rich store-houses, so long shut against foreigners, are being thrown open to the world; but what are we doing as a nation to draw this wealth into the pockets of our people? Yes, sir, this wealth is absolutely flowing along three sides of our boundary to seek a market far beyond; and still we make no effort to arrest it. Out of $644,956,406 worth of exports from the United States for the year ending June 30, 1876, (Annual Report Bureau Statistics, 1876, page 376,) $480,002,627 were transported in foreign vessels and but $160,562,954 in American vessels. Of $476,677,871 worth of imports for the same year $321,139,500 were brought in foreign vessels and only $143,389,704 in American vessels.

Mr. Chairman, if in the past, instead of directing all legislation to the purpose of grinding money out of the hard earnings of an impoverished people to put into the pockets of foreign bondholders, Congress had sought to devise ways and means of putting life and vigor into our commerce; if encouragement had been given to the building of vessels that we might carry our own exports and imports, our commerce would not be in its present dilapidated condition; and to-day, if Congress will wake up to the importance of the measure under consideration and by a competing line of railroad will connect the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans, whereby commerce and travel will be brought within our own borders, much may be done to repair past omissions and blunders.

CONCLUSION.

When the improvements of the Mississippi are completed and the jetties of Eads shall have accomplished their purpose; when two competing railroad lines span the continent with their numerous terminal branches all responding to wholesome legal restrictions touching the ratio of transportation and travel; when our finances shall have been put upon a basis which will meet the necessities of the people; when labor shall be protected against the unjust exactions of capital; when American vessels shall monopolize our carrying trade, then, and not till then, will have been accomplished the mission of the American statesman.

Sir, shall the grasping avarice and power of a single corporation built up and fostered by the Government be allowed to hold in check our national progress? Shall local jealousies and political machinations be permitted to hinder justice and bar our way to prosperity? Shall the South be forever held in subjection as though she were a conquered province? Sir, the time has come for action, and to-day one-half of our vast nation appears before the bar of Congress to demand her rights. She asks for no unusual favors; she seeks no extraordinary grants; she makes no plea for charity; she only insists that justice be done, that the same efforts which have been made, the same aid which has been given to develop the northern section of the West, be repeated in the southern half. Does she sue in vain? It is for this Congress to answer. Consider well her suit before you reject it. Teach her to love your people, your Congress, your Government by convincing her that these love justice and will do right. Force her not to despise your prejudices, your partiality, your utter indifference to her welfare.

Mr. SPARKS addressed the committee. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee informally rose, and Mr. WRIGHT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 3546) to change the name of the steamboat D. A. McDonald to Silver Wave.

The message further announced that the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 396) to amend section 2464 of the Revised Statutes relating to the cultivation of timber on the public domain, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PADDOCK, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. GROVER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3974) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1879, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SARGENT, Mr. DORSEY, and Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 4549) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. WINDOM, and Mr. EATON as conferees on the part of the Senate.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I do not propose to inflict a long speech on the committee. I intend to occupy only a portion of the hour allotted to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] as a member of the committee, reserving the remainder of it for the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

There is no proposition, Mr. Chairman, more seductive to the theorist here than a scheme to reduce the regular Army. If he is an economist of the Holman school and confounds the withholding of appropriations with economy he is carried away with it. He looks to the aggregate number of millions the Army costs annually and thinks he economizes when he cuts off a few items, without stopping to consider the mischief he inflicts. In regard to the very bill now reported we have in the estimates, Mr. Chairman, an estimate for $100,000 for recruiting expenses; giving us the number of men the dates of whose enlistment will expire during the year for which we appropriate, and also giving us the average of casualties during the year, including a small amount for the casualties of battle, and showing that it costs $20 for every enlistment, and showing us that the exact sum to fill up these gaps is $100,000. The committee cuts that estimate down to $50,000, and no doubt flattered themselves they were economizing, but thus preventing the ranks from being filled up.

But besides this spirit of false economy there is a class of visionaries, and some of them have spoken on this floor, who pretend that a United States Army of any kind is a menace to popular liberty; that any military establishment outside of State militia is pregnant with the overthrow of civil government. Sir, all through our history we have had political theorists holding to a doctrine of a revised, regenerated, well-organized State militia, but it has existed only in training days and speeches. In ordinary times the regular Army did the work, in time of war we had volunteers. When did our regular Army menace popular liberty? Why, sir, if it was fifty thousand instead of twenty-five thousand against the will of the people it would not last an hour. It has to take care of the Government property and forts and stations scattered over thousands of miles. It is a ready force to maintain order and the dignity of the law, and that law is popular will. These men, infected with this idea that a military force is dangerous to popular rights, jealous of it because in the "late unpleasantness" they learned to dislike it, carried away by this short-sighted false economy, would reduce our Army to a drummer, a fifer, and a band-master.

I want to call the attention of the committee to the character of the measure. The proper committee, the Military Committee, to whom the task was delegated, have been unable to introduce into this House a measure for the reorganization of the Army. We have heard of it all through the session with a flourish of trumpets, but in seven months they have been unable or unwilling to risk it, and now a bill for the reduction of the Army, for the reorganization of the Army, comes to us in lieu of the regular Army appropriation bill. They come here with what is, in effect, a revolutionary measure, for it is not a direct measure; it is an attempt to cut down the standing Army, which is now, by law, fixed at 35,000 men, to 20,000 men. It was their business to present us with an appropriation bill to provide the means to pay the Army that now exists under the law regulating the Army. It is saying to this House that the Appropriation Committee will not report a cent unless we consent to this change. I say, sir, it is revolutionary, an assault on law and the dignity of this House. It is an attempt on an appropriation bill to legislate a thing which only necessity can justify. It is an attempt to do what this House, I am sure, is not prepared to do, to reduce the standing Army of the United States from the number of 25,000 men, as it now exists by law, to 20,000 men. What is the present exact strength of the Army? At the Adjutant-General's Office this morning I learned that there are actually of enlisted men in the Army 23,417 men to-day, or by the latest reports. In other words, therefore, this bill proposes to muster out from the effective force of the service, from the enlisted men, 3,417 men.

I sympathized with the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] last week. He is an accomplished gentleman on any subject in his own line, familiar with some of the most intricate questions that come before this House. I sympathized with him, and even his political enemies might have sympathized with him, because he was placed before us by the Committee on Appropriations to defend a bill which he did not understand and his statement to that effect was as candid as it was gratuitous. There were a number of military men upon that committee who had been in the service and knew something of military matters, who comprehended some little of the difference between an army on the rolls and an army in the field, who at least could tell the difference between a column and a platoon, and know right shoulder shift from a martin-box. Why did not one of them undertake it? The bill, he admitted, was the work of more than one committee, and a hodge-podge of several bills in various stages, and the bill itself bears internal evidence of that.

His bill is not a bill to appropriate money to maintain the Army, but a bill to reduce it. He commences operations on the regular Army by a process Sitting Bull or Chief Joseph might have envied. Before his strategy Captain Boabdil's method of conquering an army fades away. Unabashed by the fact which he freely admits that he knows nothing about it, this military genius rushes into the reorganization of the Army with an enthusiasm only paralleled by the zeal of his Tilden campaign and likely to end in the same way.

The gentleman stated that there are only one hundred and sixty-three military posts, and he attempted to correct the statement that there were two hundred and twenty-five posts. Mr. Chairman, there are one or more companies of soldiers stationed at one hundred and fifty-two posts, and troops are stationed at eighteen arsenals, making present occupied stations one hundred and seventy. At twenty more troops would be stationed to-day if we had available troops. This I have from the Adjutant-General to-day. Of course there are other posts, enough probably to make up the number of two hundred and twenty-five he finds in some table. Let me give him a case of one of those unoccupied posts. Down near the mouth of the Delaware River there is a fort, Fort Delaware. There is no garrison there to-day. That fort is now being refitted and repaired, and if the war which is now threatening to break out between England and Russia takes place, and we have to defend our commerce against privateering, there will have to be posted at that fort alone three hundred men. There is not a soldier there now, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] would have us believe that this is one of the forts that we have no use for, for this is one of the forts not now garrisoned.

We have been told also that to-day the proportion of officers to men in the Army is greater than it has ever been before. I have a table here which shows that in 1850 the proportion of commissioned officers to men was one to ten and five-eighths men; in 1853 it was one to nine and seven-tenths men; in 1855 it was one to ten and a fraction; in 1860 it was one to ten and a fraction, and to-day, in 1878, it is one officer to eleven and one-half men. Those are the proportions, and they include all officers, a number of whom are staff officers of the different departments, the number of line officers being as one to fifteen or one to sixteen. It shows that in the past thirty years there has been no proportionate increase of officers, and that they had just as many men to the officers during republican administrations as in the old democratic administrations.

Now, I will say to the gentleman from New York, what every military man knows, than an army on paper and an army in the field are two different things. I thought when I first went into the service that it was an astonishing thing that out of 800 or 1,000 men in a regiment you could put only 450 men or 550 on the color line, but I have found by examining the records of the armies of other countries that the proportion is even greater with them of men who are unavailable for active duty. The special-duty men are necessary for all armies; they are where they are wanted, and for twenty-five and thirty cents per day extra do the work of mechanics who at those remote posts often cost us $10 to $20 per day. The men on detached service you always must have with any army; they do escort duty with trains or paymasters or parties putting up telegraphs, or for the numberless purposes an army needs. Then there are the sick and wounded and those to take care of the hospitals. And so it is our experience and the experience of every nation that when we have 25,000 men on paper we may be only able to place on day of battle more than 40 or 50 or 60 per cent. of them on the color line.

Let me again call the attention of the House to another feature of the bill. We have an Army of 25 infantry regiments, 10 cavalry regiments, and 5 artillery. If these were put up to the standard they would give us an Army of forty or forty-five thousand men, but can be kept in some degree of efficiency with 25,000 men. The committee propose to strike from the Army 10 regiments of infantry and 6 of cavalry, and in this bill they appropriate money for 20,000 men and 500 recruits, the bill also contemplating, as is thus shown, the scheme or groundwork for a still greater reduction in the future. The amount appropriated in this bill for 20,000 men and 500 recruits, as I have shown, would cause a reduction in the present standing force of the Army of 5,000 men as now fixed by law, and of 3,500 men now in service who would be required to be mustered out under the provisions of this act.

In regard to the number of officers, I wish to say to the gentleman that we have stations where during the exigencies of war there are only 8 or 10 private soldiers. During the war with Joseph I learned that 3 or 4 men were left at one station, where there was hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of property, commanded by a sergeant. At all these posts and stations and with the detachments over our enormous frontier it is well known that the interests of the public service render it desirable to have the presence of an officer. There ought to be at least one officer with each detachment, and the smaller you make the detachments the more you increase the need for officers. You know very well, too, that there are casualties with officers on duty constantly liable to occur, which makes the presence of more than one desirable; and I think that the House ought to maintain the existing organization of the Army and to see that steps are taken to put its effective force up to 25,000 men, and allow the Adjutant-General two or three thousand recruits at the recruiting stations, or at least 1,000, so that he would feel justified in keeping the Army in service continually up to the standard of 25,000.

Why, sir, to-day he has so many enlistment stations scattered over the country that he must watch carefully so as not to exceed the number of 25,000 men. He has to stop enlistments whenever he comes within four or five hundred of that number for fear he may obtain more than he can pay. By thus maintaining the present Army organization we keep officers we have educated, and can in case of war recruit up these forty regiments to forty or fifty thousand men with organization complete and in working order. Something similar to this system exists in almost every army in Europe. We cannot afford to drive out or to hire or bribe these officers to go out. The country has a right to their services; she has educated them; and, sir, I am not sure but the purpose is to get them out so as to leave room to fill up again, should the democrats again come in power, from those who were in the rebel army.

Now, what is the necessity for an Army we do not need? I would never ask an army to maintain government. We have here at this time a proposition to reduce the Army under conditions which have never before confronted the American Government. The proposition comes upon us right upon the heels of a series of disturbances that shook society to its foundation. Had any one told us that seven months of this session would elapse without some effort by legislation to remove the causes of discontent, we would not have believed them. With or without reason, there is discontent with the working classes, and while there are doubtless many lawless, vicious persons seeking turbulence and plunder, it will not do to shut our eyes to a just popular distrust. Let us do all that labor can do for the workingmen. Let us see to it that there is no just complaint about the encroachments of capital. Let us provide, if necessary, by judicious public improvements for the employment of labor. Better pay than pauperize; better provide work than an army to suppress revolted laborers. Do we propose to adjourn without doing anything in that direction, and instead of doing anything to remove popular disaffection do we propose to leave peaceful people helpless before a lawless mob, even if that mob is justly exasperated? I think laboring-men have a right to protect the price of labor by lawful means, yet I also think that we cannot leave Government helpless or strip ourselves of the means promptly and safely to vindicate the peace. On local troops rioters might be induced to fire, but there is a moral force in the regular troops, the presence of which might have saved much bloodshed last summer.

I admit that if we required an Army to maintain our Government and our institutions, even four or five hundred thousand men would not be enough. The only pillar of the Republic is the love of the people. Against the sovereign will of the majority you might multiply armies until they were like the sands on the sea-shore, and they would never give you security and peace. But when I say that, I am also conscious that something is due the dignity of law; something is due society; something is due the people for whose comfort, rights, and safety government exists.

In the days of Washington, when there were but thirty-five hundred thousand people in this country, the Army was proportionately three or four times greater than it is to day. In the days of Jefferson the Army was greater in proportion than it is to-day. And were those statesmen second to us in their devotion to republican liberty? Did they regard the United States Army they first organized as contrary to the genius of the American Government?

Gentlemen may say that there is no need of an army. Sir, we have already seen the need of an army in this country. We saw it in the unpunished tragedies of Baton Rouge, and Vicksburgh, and Kemper County. Last summer the governors of States whose voices had hardly ceased to echo in denouncing the intrusion of Federal troops into the Southern States, in declaring that it was an invasion of the rights of the States to send those troops within their borders to maintain the peace, those very governors pleaded with the President to send troops into their States of Virginia and Maryland in order to enable them to preserve the peace. Nor do I think, sir, that the use of troops in the States recently in rebellion was uncalled for or inconsistent with the spirit of republican liberty. If they were recalled before every man, white and black, was safe—safe and truly free, with all his civil rights in their fullest extent—they were recalled too soon. If they were recalled before the new civilization the war planted had taken living root they were recalled too soon. And I say to those southern gentlemen, and I say it in all kindness, that for them there is neither peace nor security in the future but in the fullest recognition of the rights of the colored race. Politicians may intrigue and Presidents vacillate, but the Lord God omnipotent reigneth.

It is a happy temperament that in a moment of peace believes all future war impossible. I never wish to see, nor do I fear in this nineteenth century that our Republic will ever be like the Roman republic, a community of warlike banditti, preying upon all nations. And yet, sir, we cannot neglect the martial spirit which gave us our Government, and which may be able to maintain it. The gentleman from New York may be a theorist in regard to the Army; he is not in other matters. In case of extreme necessity he has indicated patriotism and State militia, and he may fall back on a theoretical spirit of patriotism and the Pittsburgh militia to quell a mob. Let us remove, if possible, the causes of mobs; but if lawless persons increase I am sure the mass of the American people will not justify us in neglecting a just precaution.

How is it? It is not yet ten months since a United States frigate lay moored here in the Potomac for the purpose of defending the National Treasury and national archives with her guns against an anticipated mob from a neighboring city.

We have a frontier of many thousand miles. In the speech of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] he proposed that we should abandon three-fourths of all the stations and posts on the frontier. The only posts in that country which preserve peace on the frontier among the Indians and teach these nomads, even if justly exasperated, our power.

I believe that my researches into this subject give me some right to speak. I think that the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCOOK] did not number the Indians too greatly when he said that there were four hundred thousand of them in this country. We have no means of ascertaining the exact number of the wild Indians. All statistics on the subject are worthless, for the wild Indians are as jealous of enumeration as they are of surveying. Let me say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] that the Nez Percés, numbering but a few hundred men and requiring fifteen hundred soldiers to subdue them, were civilized Indians, Indians who had made great advances in the arts of modern American society, but having been badly used they went into war and those three or four hundred Indians required three armies and fifteen hundred men to subdue them.

The Dakota Indians to-day number more wild Indians than the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] was willing to admit there were in the whole country. And the Apaches and Comanches and other tribes scattered over that great wilderness are largely in excess of the number that he would fix for the wild Indians. Indeed, it is safe to say that the wild Indians to be held in check by our troops are not much short of one hundred and fifty thousand men. They are nomads, scattered over and wandering over thousands of miles; rovers on the prairie, in the forest, on the mountains. They are well armed and have proved themselves no contemptible opponents.

I remember that once, but a few years ago, a band of wild Indians came into a remote settlement near the Saline River, in my own State, and that peaceful Sunday afternoon murdered eighteen helpless people. One woman clutching her two babes, one on each arm, fled for safety across the bend of the timber, pursued by the merciless savages. She was there overtaken, her two children snatched from her and their brains dashed out against the trees, and she herself was carried into a wretched captivity. That, sir, was not a solitary case. Time and again have I seen these settlements helpless for want of sufficient military force. I appeal to you, gentlemen, for the just protection of these and all our frontiers.

That gentleman must have a very happy temperament who to-day thinks that we are to have no renewal of those scenes. Sir, they are recurring all through our history. Last year we had two of our bloodiest Indian wars. From the time when the settlers first went up the Connecticut River to found new settlements at its source, we have had those troubles; from the time settlers first went up to the head of the Mohawk, to the Wyoming Valley, these chapters in our history have a bloody record; from the time when they first crossed the Alleghany Mountains, from the time when Colonel Clark first pierced the wilderness of the Mississippi Valley, with his command, to the Illinois region and took old Kaskaskia, those scenes have occurred. If we neglect to take steps to protect the frontier, we have not the apology of ignorance.

The cause of disagreement between the settlers and the Indians arises from the change in their condition. No longer can these nomads live as they used to live. It is now with them a question of existence. Formerly they lived upon the wild game; we have occupied the country, and they can live upon that no longer. The nomad is confronted with the problems of civilization. The settler and pioneer is the true type of the modern American man. Let us justly estimate the services of the pioneers of the West. They have been the founders of empires, the builders of millions of homes of independent happy men and women. They have warred against privations and hardships, against stocks and stones, against principalities and powers. They have made the wilderness to blossom as the rose. Great States lie in the tracks of the pioneers whose weary feet have pressed the western shores of the Missouri. He is the founder of a new dispensation. The prophet of our higher civilization, surely he is worthy of protection.

The condition of the Indians is indeed changed. We confine them to reservations and appropriate two or three cents per head to support them for the year. We desire that they should learn to live as we do, but they are there. Under these changed conditions are we to be told that we need no Army? Are we now to dismember the Army, to destroy its efficiency, and then when these terrible tragedies occur to lament them when we could have prevented them?

It is according to the theory and genius of our civilization that this progress shall be made. But this course presents questions which with these wild Indians are most powerful and influential, and which we cannot wonder they consider; they are questions which will stir them to the very depths; they are questions which may plunge them into war at any moment. To-day we need a sufficient army to preserve the peace of the frontier, to give to the settlers there that security we never yet have given them. I say that those horrid massacres are a disgrace to our Government; and we shall not be justified if we refuse to furnish the means to prevent them, until all these questions are fully met and finally settled.

Within the last fifteen months we have known two of the most terrible Indian wars that ever occurred in our history—that of Joseph and that of Sitting Bull—Sitting Bull, who retreated as a conqueror across the Canada line and treated our commissioners with disdain. Yet the gentleman from New York said that we would have no more Indian wars, no more local disturbances, no distubances on our frontiers. He seems to have been reading about the millennium, and is prepared to beat his sword into a plow-share and his spear into a pruning-hook. Of course he must be ignorant of our vast frontier and its necessities, otherwise I know his generous heart would have impelled him to resist and prevent the horrible atrocities which this bill would entail upon those settlements and which I ask him to pause and consider.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to occupy the time that should be accorded to other gentlemen. I merely desire to call attention to this proposition in an appropriation bill to cut down the regular Army, to reduce it at the very time when we ought rather to increase it.

Every question of prudence certainly indicates that at the present time we should maintain the Army at its present standard, and, at least, not reduce it. I do not believe this House will do anything of the kind. I wish that the Committee on Appropriations had reported a different bill; for this is such a tissue of contradictions, of new ideas, of propositions many of which will not be acted on, that I scarcely believe it will be possible for the Committee of the Whole, proceeding under the five-minute rule, to lick it into shape. It would be easier to make a new one. I believe the best thing we could do would be to send it back to the committee with instructions to bring in a bill that should appropriate according to law the money necessary to maintain the Army established as it now exists by law.

Mr. BANNING addressed the committee. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

When he had spoken one hour,

The CHAIRMAN said: The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to move that the committee rise.

Mr. HOOKER, Mr. MAGINNIS, Mr. MARSH, and others asked that Mr. BANNING's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Ohio desire?

Mr. BANNING. Twenty or twenty-five minutes will suffice, I think.

Mr. MARSH. Let him have an additional hour, if he needs it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman from Ohio thirty minutes?

Mr. ALDRICH. I object. Let him print the rest of his speech.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, obtained the floor and yielded twenty minutes of his time to Mr. BANNING.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. I rose immediately upon the expiration of the hour of the gentleman from Ohio, caught the eye of the Chair, and was recognized for the purpose of moving that the committee rise, with the view, if the committee should rise, of moving in the House that general debate on this bill be limited to ten or twenty minutes. I do not care particularly whether that be done or not; but my point of order is that I was recognized and had the right to make that motion at the close of the hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, following the list before him, was under obligations to recognize the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CALDWELL,] who speaks in the time of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] a member of the committee.

Mr. BANNING. I hope the gentleman will let me finish, which I will do in a few moments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thought the gentleman from Illinois rose for the purpose of moving the extension of the time of the gentleman from Ohio who had the floor.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. No, I rose to a question of order. I do not care what the committee do with the motion, but I make the point it is my right to submit the motion at the close of the gentlemen's hour that the committee rise. I do not say I could take the gentleman off the floor for that purpose, but I apprehend it is out of the power of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole and four or five members to run this committee in continuous session to seven or eight or nine or ten o'clock. I apprehend any member of the House has the right when the gentlemen's time has expired to be recognized to make that motion.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. It is for that purpose I rose and insist on making the motion.

Mr. EDEN. Does the gentleman object to giving the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs a little further time to conclude his remarks?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am not speaking on that question now.

Mr. EDEN. Does the gentleman object to giving a little time to the gentleman from Ohio to finish his speech?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am not in debt to the gentleman for courtesy; but I am not speaking of that matter now.

Mr. EDEN. What I wish to ask my colleague is whether he objects to extending the time of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. That question is not before the committee at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois rises for the purpose of moving the committee rise to test the sense of the committee itself. It is equivalent to a motion to adjourn and the Chair will submit it to the committee.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I hope the House will not close debate until I have had a chance to say something on this bill. My district is more concerned than any other represented upon this floor, and I hope, therefore, I shall have time to say something.

The CHAIRMAN. It is for the committee to decide whether it shall rise or not.

The committee refused to rise.

Mr. BANNING. I am obliged to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CALDWELL,] and I am sorry the gentleman from Illinois was not indebted to me for courtesy. I do not think I ever had an opportunity to offer it or he would have been.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman refused to yield to me a moment ago when he yielded to other gentlemen.

Mr. BANNING. I am not indebted to the gentleman for any courtesy.

Mr. MARSH. Honors are easy, then.

Mr. BANNING then resumed and concluded his speech.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HEWITT, of New York, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that that body had refused to pass an act (H. R. No. 4245) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint James Shields, of Missouri, a brigadier-general in the United States Army on the retired list.

It further announced that the Senate further insist upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 2507) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House, and agree to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WINDOM, Mr. BLAINE, and Mr. WITHERS as managers of said conference on its part.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose this evening to discuss the bill now before the committee at any considerable length. I do not myself profess to be an expert or a professional on questions of that sort, but shall address myself to some questions in which the people I have the honor to represent upon this floor feel and believe they have a deeper and more direct interest than in the one now before the House. I will, however, state in the outset that so far as the pending bill is concerned it meets with my sincere approval, providing for not only a reduction of the Army, but what is vastly of more importance to the people of the country, an immense reduction of the burdens annually imposed upon them for the support of that arm of the service. As has been stated, the use to which an Army in this country may be applied, and to which our Army is applied in time of peace, is the protection of our frontier and the defense of our people against the incursions of the savage Indians.

But, sir, another question has been raised in the course of this debate, and to that question I propose for a few minutes to address myself, dissenting as I do with great deference, from the opinions of some gentlemen who have preceded me in this discussion.

The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] in opening the debate upon this bill was pleased to use what I regarded at the time as language somewhat remarkable upon the subject of strikes. He said this:

Now we are told that we ought to have a large Army, and a very large Army, in order to put down impending strikes. I take issue with that proposition. It is not in accordance with the theory of this Government that the United States is to maintain an Army for the purpose of restraining any portion of its citizens in their just rights. The right to strike is a just right.

And again:

It was intended by the framers of the Constitution that the States should not only be sovereign within their own limits, but that they should maintain order within their own limits, and, if they fail to do so, that they should and must take the consequences.

And again:

It is the business of the States to protect order within their own limits, and it forms no part of the business of the General Government to supply by its power any neglect on the part of the States to do the duty which they reserved to themselves under the provisions of the Constitution.

Sir, in reference to the subject of strikes, any debate upon this floor must be incomplete unless you call to your mind the strikes that occurred in this country during the last year. There, sir, was not simply on the part of the laborers a refusal to work, for the gentleman from New York is right when he says no man can be compelled to work against his will. But, sir, no man on this floor can fail to remember that that strike amounted to something more. No man can fail to remember that it resulted in the destruction of millions of dollars of corporate and private property.

Sir, a man has a right to refuse to work, but the very moment he himself attempts or combines with others to prevent by force anybody else from working, or to interfere with the rights of property by destroying property or by restraining the owner of property in its lawful use, that very moment he becomes—what? He becomes a violator of the law. He and his confederates are guilty of "domestic violence," and subject to be treated as rioters and outlaws.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion there? The gentleman surely did not understand me to defend for a moment the right of interference with anybody else. The right to refrain from labor if a man chooses was all I asserted. The right to interfere with anybody else I deny as earnestly as the gentleman from Tennessee does.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. That question could hardly arise, for no one could dispute that position. The true issue is whether on such an occasion as that which arose in West Virginia, in Pennsylvania, and in Maryland, and when the Legislature of the State cannot be convened, and the governor calls upon the Executive for aid—whether or not it is his duty to furnish it; and I do confess, sir, when I come to read this provision of the Constitution I am surprised that any doubt should be entertained by any gentleman upon the floor as to what was the duty of President Hayes when this demand was made upon him by the governors of these several States. What is the language of the Constitution?

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

Is there anything said in that section of the Constitution in reference to this being done by militia? Not at all. Would any gentleman upon this floor pretend for a moment that if the State of New York were to-morrow to be invaded by an armed force from Canada the only power of the President would be to organize a militia and call them into action for the purpose of protecting her against that invasion?

And yet identically the same language is used with reference to domestic violence that is used with reference to an invasion. The rights, powers, and duties of the Government in both cases are identically the same, except that in case of domestic violence the Legislature or governor must apply for protection. What would the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] say to a construction of the Constitution that would leave his State only the protection of militia, and take away from the United States Government the power to repel the invasion by the regular Army? I submit, sir, that no such limited construction as that can be put upon the power of the Government over the subject of domestic violence in the States. Nothing can be truer, however, than that it is the duty of the States to provide means to suppress domestic violence. This they ought to do. But suppose the States fail to do this, as many of them do fail to do it, then I submit that when the violence comes and the State Legislature or governor has made the demand in accordance with the Constitution no course is left this Government save and except to respond to that call.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is said to be a very good one. No doubt it is. I am glad to see that it meets the approval, I believe in the main, of both committees, that on Appropriations and that on Military Affairs. It is very satisfactory to see that when honorable and distinguished gentlemen composing the Committee on Appropriations see proper to step into military affairs and themselves report a bill to this House upon that subject—I say it is gratifying to see that they succeed so well in representing the views of the House. They deserve to be complimented for the success with which they have tried their hands from time to time on almost every subject of legislation. I have happened myself, in the course of my service here, to have occasion to feel that other committees of the House were seemingly crawling around under their huge legs seeking for "themselves dishonorable graves." I remember, more than two years ago, to have spent several days in the State Department trying to inform myself as to the wants and necessities of that Department, for I was then a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, of which you, Mr. Chairman, was then, as you are now, the honored chairman. So far as I know, our committee was never consulted in reference to the legislation that related to that Department.

I am not now finding fault with the committee; I simply say that it is unfortunate that they are acting to-day in the line of precedent; it is unfortunate that the rules of the House have thrown into one committee of the House the control of almost its entire business. That has been done, sir. I have said the control of its entire business, but I retract the statement. There is one committee in this House which the Committee on Appropriations has not yet supplanted; there is a committee that has come forward and presented a bill appropriating a larger amount of money than is to be saved by this bill, the sum of $7,000,000, and the Committee on Appropriations never tackled that bill. Appropriations for the Kiskiminetas and Conemaugh passed through without challenge from the Committee on Appropriations.

I should like at some future Congress to see some committee, which in the language of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MCCOOK,] and which I do not adopt by any means, develops such versatility of talent, take charge of a river and harbor bill and give gentlemen an opportunity of considering the propriety of voting away seven or eight million dollars of the public money.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the Committee on Appropriations has not interfered with the Committee on War Claims in any manner.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. No; but the House has. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have referred to the river and harbor bill rather for the purpose of making a personal explanation than anything else, and I regret that my friend from Maryland [Mr. ROBERTS] is absent on account of sickness. I allude to him now because, when the question was up upon the protest made against the passage of that bill, he took occasion to read from the RECORD to show that some gentlemen who signed that protest thought proper to vote for a river and harbor bill under a suspension of the rules two years ago, of whom I happened to be one. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire here and now to vindicate my consistency, although I may have to do it at the expense of my personal firmness. I do it in order that my constituents may understand that I have never, for a moment, since I have been in this House approved such legislation. Two years ago I voted against the river and harbor bill. After the vote had been taken a judicious and patriotic colleague [General DIBRELL] came and made a personal appeal to me to change my vote. He stated that he was exceedingly anxious that the entire Tennessee delegation should vote in favor of the measure, as it contained a liberal appropriation for Tennessee. My vote was changed at his request. This year my friend made a similar appeal to me, but not with a like result. I signed the protest; and, protesting now that I meant nothing personal as to any gentleman who voted for the bill, still think the protest contained sound doctrine.

As I stated at the opening, I have not risen so much for the purpose of discussing this particular measure as of calling the attention of the committee to some other questions that the people in that part of the country from which I come are more or less interested in.

I allude first to a question which has engaged occasionally on Fridays the attention of the House, the subject of war claims. I do it now because during this Congress I have uniformly voted against them. I have helped to strike out enacting clauses and I expect to continue to do so. A large number of bills of this sort have been introduced which have been paraded all over the country and long lists of which have been published and sent out in speeches as evidence of the fact that the South intends to make a raid upon the Treasury, bankrupt the Government, and ruin the country.

Now I have this to say upon that particular point: it is not wise or politic, in my judgment, to bring into this House these claims. I have no complaint to make against gentlemen who do so, but it tends to perpetuate among our people an unjust and irritating discrimination, a discrimination which I desire to see, some early day, forever buried and forgotten. It is the discrimination between loyal and disloyal men. Is there never to be a time in the history of this country when there shall be no distinction of that sort drawn between citizens of the South?

Mr. Chairman, I happened to be—and I mention it neither in pride nor shame—but I happened to be one of the few members from the South that took, at that desk, the oath that I suppose all gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber took or can take. Twice have I taken it in front of the Speaker's stand, and twice have I been elected to a seat here by a generous constituency, that had allied itself by an overwhelming majority to the confederate cause. Nor do I believe to-day that any considerable complaint would be made in the South if it were to be understood, once for all, that these war claims were not to be paid. What are you to say in reference to the thousands and tens of thousands of men in the South who cannot come and collect a war claim because they cannot establish their loyalty, but who, according to every principle of law and justice, are to be considered as loyal as any gentleman upon this floor?

Many such there were who yielded an allegiance to the confederacy. They yielded allegiance to it because it exercised its power over them; they not only yielded it their allegiance but they lent it their assistance. And there is no principle of law better settled—gentlemen will find it asserted in Grotius, in Puffendorf, in Blackstone, and elsewhere—than that wherever a usurper takes possession of a government the citizen is not only excused but absolutely justified in yielding allegiance and rendering assistance to him. Miserable indeed would be the condition of a citizen if both the usurping and the displaced authority could punish him for disobedience.

Of that class of men whose houses were burned, whose crops were taken, whose property was seized and used by the Government, not one can come and expect to obtain from the Government one dollar for his property so taken. Briefly, then, Mr. Chairman, my position is that all these claims should be permitted to go down with the passions and prejudices and bitternesses of the war.

There is one other subject to which I desire to address myself; that is, the subject of subsidies, and especially and particularly the subsidy to the Texas and Pacific Railroad. You have heard to-day a distinguished member of this House, [Mr. SINGLETON;] you have heard from him a long, able, and elaborate appeal for the passage of a bill granting a subsidy to the Texas and Pacific Railroad.

Now I desire to say that, in my opinion, if I am instructed upon anything, so far as my course here is concerned, I am instructed to vote against that or any other subsidy. Representing as I do a southern constituency, I say here that my people do not want money taken out of their pockets to be paid over to a private corporation or to a private individual; nor do they want to give their credit for such a purpose. And I am not here by my vote to give their credit to the extent of a solitary dollar for any such purpose.

I was unable to hear most of the speech delivered by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON.] I have, however, heard the usual arguments made in favor of that proposition.

Mr. HOUSE. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. HOUSE. I will ask my colleague if recently there have not been meetings held in his district instructing him to vote for the very measure which he is now denouncing upon this floor.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. How many of them?

Mr. HOUSE. I do not know; it is in your district.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I can tell my colleague [Mr. HOUSE] how many. There was a meeting held in one county in my district, and that was not far from Memphis, a city that desires to be the terminus of the Texas and Pacific Railroad. But I understand that even at Memphis they are opposed to any subsidy to the Texas and Pacific Railroad, unless the terminus of that road is at Memphis; if it goes to Vicksburgh then it is not desirable. [Laughter.] Now I do not undertake to say how it is, but it may be that the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] would be opposed to the Texas and Pacific Railroad if the terminus was to be at Memphis. [Laughter.]

Mr. SINGLETON. Allow me to say to the gentleman that he is mistaken altogether. And I think that he will find that his constituents are not in accord with him when he returns home. And if they shall retire him I shall be very sorry.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman. I will have to look out for that. [Laughter.] Unfortunately for the gentleman's position, I canvassed my district pretty thoroughly. I took bold grounds upon this question, and I was assailed for it every day by a competitor. I took grounds everywhere against any subsidy for the Texas and Pacific Railroad or any other road. And I do not think that in all my travels through the country there I met more than one man who was an outspoken advocate of the measure. Still I know that public opinion is now being worked up by sending blank petitions out into the country for signatures. There is to be a pressure brought to bear in that way to influence the action of Congress upon it. I think they have been experimenting a little on that line in my district. That is my judgment. [Laughter.]

There is a class of quiet and intelligent farmers living in the country there who are tax-payers. They have no interest in railroad stocks; they know but little about them. They have bought no land on the line of the Texas and Pacific Railroad and they have no grand speculation in view. Now, I do not want to vote one cent out of their pockets and I do not mean to vote one cent out of their pockets to help build a railroad for anybody else.

But gentlemen say, why we offer an abundant lien to the Government; the Government cannot lose anything. Well, if they offer so good a lien to the Government, then why not offer that good lien to the capitalists of this and other countries? Satisfy the capitalist of that fact and you can perhaps raise what money you want. Why do you want the Government to come in and indorse, if your lien is so good? Take your public lands and your guarantees to the capitalists of the world and tell them you want to borrow money upon their faith and credit, and if they will not touch them, neither should the Government touch them.

I have sometimes thought that we were living fast enough anyhow. I think we have nearly enough railroads in the country; that is my judgment. Private enterprise may build as many as it sees proper; nobody can control that. But it seems to me that a grave mistake is committed in making such ample provision for our internal commerce and giving such little attention and furnishing such poor facilities to our foreign commerce.

We have to-day $4,000,000,000 invested in means of carrying our internal commerce. In American and foreign shipping, used in our foreign commerce, there are to-day two hundred millions invested. We are not needing another road to the Pacific nearly as much as we want an outlet to South America, to the "ever faithful isle" that lies close to our doors, and also to Mexico and to the other countries around us.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Would the gentleman favor a subsidy to a Brazilian line from New Orleans in order to advance commerce with South America?

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I favor subsidies to no sort of lines, [laughter;] but when I embark my constituents into the subsidy business, I propose to put that subsidy where I think it will do them and the country the most good. I would rather vote a subsidy in such a way that the thousands and millions of surplus products in this country to-day might find a market. Intelligent gentlemen who have appeared before the committee of which I have the honor to be a member, have not hesitated to express the opinion that this country to-day has double the amount of products that it can consume; and where is your foreign market?

In various ways, Mr. Chairman, the export of our surplus products might be promoted. In the brief time allowed me I shall not undertake to recapitulate them; but instead of trying to encourage still further internal commerce and to provide additional means of internal transportation at the public expense, we had better, in my judgment, give attention to this other most important subject.

Mr. Chairman, the people of the South are not mendicants. They are not here begging this Congress for anything. They are not robbers. They do not desire to defraud the National Treasury of one dollar. They did desire at one time to be severely "let alone." Thanks to the gentleman who presides at the other end of the Avenue, they have been let alone, and they feel grateful to him to-day for it. They do not want to disturb him in his seat—nothing of the sort. [Laughter.] I do not think gentlemen on this side of the Chamber desire to disturb him in his seat. He has done too many good things for which they are grateful to him. He first established his claim to their gratitude when he saw proper to overlook so many distinguished men upon the other side of the Chamber, identified with him in politics, and select for a Cabinet position controlling the Department nearest to the people, and in which there was supposed to be most crookedness and fraud and corruption, an honored democrat of the State of Tennessee—not only a life-long democrat, but an exconfederate, a man in whom the people of Tennessee had confidence. I say they must feel kindly toward the President, and feeling so why should you on the other side be afraid that there is an effort on our part to unseat him? Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, my friend Judge BOONE has a long and interesting speech upon the subject of the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department, and it would be doing injustice to him if I should enter upon that question. [Laughter.] While I myself am opposed to the transfer——

Mr. EDEN. Why?

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. For two reasons. The first reason is that two years ago, when this same question was up, I voted against the transfer and I desire now to be consistent. [Laughter.] I voted that way without any duress or persuasion from anybody. I believed then as I believe now that the system we are pursuing is the best that can be adopted for the purpose of civilizing the Indians. I believe also that there is more economy in the present management. In saying this I mean no imputation upon Army officers, for as a class of men they are honorable and true, but everybody knows that an Army officer, especially one educated at West Point, is a gentleman of lofty ideas. He believes in dealing liberally with the world; he never higgles about prices; he believes it to be beneath the dignity of a great Government like ours to stand upon small differences. He is not the man to economize public money, and when the money goes into his hands somehow or other it is not considered in the best taste to investigate his accounts too closely.

I do not mean to say that we have now by any means the proper class of men as Indian agents. For one I would be willing to vote enough money to secure a better class of agents than we now have, so as to bring about a more honest and efficient administration of the Indian Bureau.

Mr. EDEN. How much money would that take?

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I am not prepared to say; I do not think any one could tell. It is the business of the Committee on Appropriations to look into that question. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BOONE.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BOONE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOONE. How much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes.

Mr. BOONE. If I had more time and if my friend from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL] would do me the honor to listen to me, I flatter myself that I could persuade him to be at least as consistent on the question of the transfer of the Indian Bureau as he was on the river and harbor bill. But, of course, in ten minutes I cannot hope to do more than enter upon the threshold of an argument.

Mr. EDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to continue until half-past four o'clock, the time when the committee will rise.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Kentucky will continue his remarks until half-past four, the time fixed for the recess. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BOONE. I am very much obliged for this courtesy.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Chair will allow me to ask whether this evening's session is for debate only.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House adopted last week the session of this evening will be for general business. It will be for the House to determine this evening whether it will go into Committee of the Whole. If it should do so, this bill will be resumed. Otherwise the unfinished business in the House will be in order. The Chair would also state that if the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole the Chair will award the floor this evening to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. REAGAN. Is it understood that we are to go on into Committee of the Whole this evening on the Army appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. That will be for the House to determine on assembling at the evening session. No order can be made in committee at this time.

Mr. REAGAN. If it be agreeable I should like by unanimous consent to have it understood that to-night we shall proceed with the general discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done in the House, and not in committee.

Mr. BURCHARD. It will be for the chairman of the committee to say whether he wants to go on with this bill or not.

Mr. BOONE. I do not want my whole time consumed in these colloquies.

The CHAIRMAN. No order can be made in committee for business during the evening session.

Mr. BOONE. Mr. Chairman, the two great sources of relief to the overtaxed people of this country are to be found in the economy of expenditures of the public money and honesty in the administration of the affairs of the Government, because following these come reductions in our oppressive tariff and the lessening of the cost of those articles which enter into the daily consumption of our people. Our Appropriation Committee, presided over with so much ability by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] has, in my judgment, done its work faithfully and well. And if the appropriations which they recommend shall be as faithfully expended we will then have started on a career of greater prosperity than has characterized the Government for many years past, and which, being continued, will result in relieving the oppressed labor of the country from its present burdens and thus restore us to that degree of prosperity which is so much needed at present, and which is so essential to the growth and development of this God-favored land of ours. In the direction of that reform which we hear so much about, and which we know to be so essential to the prosperity of the country, the Committee on Appropriations have, in the bill under discussion, reduced the number of enlisted men in our Army from about 25,000 to 20,000 men, which is a long step in the right direction, which I trust is to be followed up by still further reductions, until our Army is reduced to a purely "peace footing" and to such a standard as shall comport with the dignity and genius of a republican Government, which rests for its security not upon its warlike and threatening attitude toward the people, but a government whose foundations are laid deep in the affections and pride of a contented and intelligent people.

But, Mr. Chairman, I desire in the remarks which I desire to submit to speak not so much of the general scope of this bill but more directly to an amendment which will be proposed to the bill at a proper time. I refer to an amendment which proposes to transfer the management of Indian affairs from the Interior to the War Department.

Mr. Chairman, I have occupied but a small portion of the time of this House in speech-making. I have been content to occupy my place quietly but constantly, and have tried to cast my vote intelligently upon all matters of legislation presented to this body. And I would not now ask the attention of the House upon a matter of less importance than the amendment under consideration, for I feel that much of the time consumed in discussion here is a waste of opportunities to effect legislation important to the country. But the question under consideration is, in my judgment, a matter of deep and vital importance to both the Government and the Indians, as both will be in many important particulars affected by this legislation if the measure now proposed shall become a law. I therefore ask the attention of the House while I shall try to present in a brief manner the reasons which control my mind in advocating the adoption of this measure. And in doing so I shall endeavor to present facts rather than rely upon declamation.

Various theories have been suggested for the government of the Indians, some, perhaps, wise, and many, otherwise. Every man you meet has a theory peculiar to himself, some containing practical ideas, others, the wildest and most absurd speculations. Unfortunately the Government has no theory. It has never had a policy. Various expedients have been resorted to, none of which has proven satisfactory. And I repeat, we have had no fixed and settled policy in regard to the management of Indian affairs, except perhaps in one regard, and that is to make treaties and violate them whenever it seemed to be our interest to do so, to appropriate money to support the Indians and send out agents to squander and consume it. And while I admit that the Indians have committed many outrageous and atrocious crimes against our own people, which are inexcusable, these outrages in many instances are greatly palliated by the injustice with which we have treated them. But I shall have more to say of this hereafter.

The amendment to which I refer proposes to transfer the management of Indian affairs from the Interior Department to the War Department; and I beg gentlemen who oppose the amendment not to attempt to prejudice the measure by asserting that it proposes to turn the Indians over to the management of the Army. Such is not the purpose of the amendment, and it is unfair to so state the question. We do not propose to control the Indians at all, except as it shall become necessary to do so in order to quell disturbances, prevent incursions, or suppress warlike demonstrations, in either of which cases the interposition of the military arm of the Government is necessary, whether the management of Indian affairs be in one Department or another.

But we have diversified and to some extent complicated treaty relations with the Indians, which require intelligent and honest administration, which must be conducted by some Department of the Government, and the question at issue is, which Department will best administer and conduct these important relations. This is the whole question and ought to be solved alone by the calm, dispassionate judgment of this House without regard to party or section, and with the view only of doing the very best we can for the Indians and for the Government. I look at it, therefore, as a practical question, involving the highest interests of the Indian tribes as well as the important duties of the Government toward them. And I agree that in deciding it our judgments should be tempered with that feeling of moderation and charity which is alway felt by the stronger for the weaker side. We have the power to do with and for our once powerful but now weak and defenseless red brethren as we may choose, but in our dealings with them the highest moral obligations are involved. These obligations we must meet and discharge at whatever cost; for, sir, we cannot afford to do wrong, even to carry out our cherished policy of "economy and reform."

I agree, Mr. Chairman, with the statement of the minority of the committee, whose views are presented with the majority report upon this measure, that our management of Indian affairs forms a sad chapter in our history. That our dealings with the Indians in the past have been frequently characterized by great and sometimes disgraceful wrongs is indeed a proposition we cannot deny. But, sir, is it true that these wrongs are attributable to the Army or the officers of the Army? What has the Army done to wrong the Indians, except the excesses (which are incident to a state of war) to which they have gone while engaged in actual war with them, or in pursuing the general policy of the Government toward them? Now, sir, I do not pretend to say that the officers of our Army are free from the ordinary motives which control other men, or are free from the ordinary vices which characterize other men, but I suppose that Army officers are very much like other people, and surrounded by the same circumstances as other men with the same motives and opportunities, they are likely to act pretty much as other men do. I do not believe that simply because a man happens to be an officer in the Army that he is therefore a monster and not to be trusted. Nor do I suppose he is therefore a saint and incapable of doing wrong. I propose, therefore, in this discussion to regard them just as I do other men; and yet I hope to be able to show that it would be better for the Indians and cheaper for the Government that our Indian affairs should be under the control of the War Department rather than the Interior Department.

I further agree, Mr. Chairman, that our first great object should be to insure the greatest good to the Indians, and, whatever may be the cost to the Government, I would do absolute justice to them; for if I know myself I would not under any circumstances advocate the passage of this or any other measure calculated to inflict wrong or injury upon them if I knew it.

Sir, what do the Indian tribes most need at present? Not protection against a foreign enemy, for they have none; not protection against inroads and encroachments from each other, for they are at peace with each other; but, sir, they do need protection against the horde of thieves and scoundrels who, under the guise of friendship, are engaged in stealing the very pittance which they receive from the Government, and which goes to them, or ought to go to them, in the shape of bread to eat and clothes to wear. This I know is a pretty hard saying, but it is painfully true, and will be manifest to every one who will take the trouble to investigate the facts connected with our past management of Indian affairs.

Previous to 1849—at least for a number of years before that time—the management of Indian affairs was under the control of the War Department. In that year (1849) the Department of the Interior was created by law and the whole management of the Indians immediately turned over to that Department. What, sir, is the history of this question under that management? I affirm, without fear of successful contradiction, that it has been one of repeated wrongs, frauds, robbery, and plunder, and that the grossest irregularities have crept into every branch of the Indian service; and such has been and is the extent of these frauds and irregularities that it is now openly charged and very generally believed that a ring, known as the "Indian ring," has been formed and now exists, composed of persons employed in the Indian Bureau and wealthy and influential persons outside, whose practice is to swindle the Indians and the Government in every way possible. In proof of this, if it needs proof, I refer to and quote from a report made by Hon. J. W. Nesmith, who was upon a committee appointed in 1865 by the two Houses of Congress to inquire into the condition of our Indian tribes. In his report as chairman of a subcommittee he says:

Another great cause of complaint is the worthless quality of the goods which are bought in the Atlantic States and sent out for distribution among them. There is a great fault somewhere, either on the part of the agents who make the purchases in the eastern markets or on the part of the merchants or contractors who supply the goods. From the personal inspection which I have given these goods and in comparing them with the invoices, I am thoroughly convinced that the contractors are guilty of the most outrageous and systematic swindling and robbery. Their acts can properly be characterized by no other terms. There is evidence also that the persons employed in the Department to make the purchases are accomplices in these crimes. I have examined invoices of purchases made by the Department or its agents in eastern cities where the prices charged were from 50 to 100 per cent. above the market value of good articles. Upon an examination of the goods, I have found them as a general thing worthless and deficient in quantity. Among them were steel spades made of sheet-iron, chopping-axes which were purely cast-iron, "best brogans" with paper soles, blankets made of shoddy and glue, which came to shreds the first time they were wet, &c.

But the folly or wrong of these purchases made by dishonest agents from dishonest contractors does not cease here. Many articles are purchased which would be utterly useless to the Indians if their quality was ever so good; such as iron spoons, mirrors, gimlets, Jew's-harps, hair-oil, finger-rings, and in one case which came under my observation forty dozen pairs of elastic garters were sent out to a single tribe in which there was not a single pair of stockings. Agent Wilbur, in charge of the Yakama reservation, in a report upon this subject, says: "The goods furnished from the Atlantic States have been of an inferior quality, often damaged, and sometimes short in quantity. Of the first invoice of annuity goods received here, there was a large number of blankets short. Of other goods which arrived here in 1862, there was a deficiency of fourteen pairs of blankets, twenty-one yards of checks and stripes, and six pairs of brogans, besides twenty-five pairs of blankets rat-eaten to that extent that they were considered worthless. Thirty-seven pairs of pants and twenty-two coats, on opening the cases, were found to be wet and completely rotten. The woolen goods sent out have been almost universally worthless; clothes made up for school from annuity goods, many of them, were not worth the making. The same might be truthfully said in regard to the quality of hoes, axes, pitchforks, and shovels, many of which were not worth the transportation from Dalles, Oregon, to this place, a distance of seventy-five miles."

In that same report is found the following, showing the frauds in the transportation:

The time and manner in which the goods have been shipped have been most unfortunately chosen. The goods of 1863 were not only shipped by the costly isthmus route, but they were subject to exorbitant charge for packing, drayage, &c., (for detail of which see comparative schedule marked G,) and the bulky nature of some of the articles was such as to make the freight a great deal more than the value of the goods delivered. The purchases in 1864 were all shipped via Cape Horn and San Francisco to Salem. Salem was the proper destination of no part of the goods. Your familiar acquaintance with the country enables you to see at once the absurdity of shipping goods bound for Warm Springs or Umatilla up the Willamette River to Salem, thence down the river to Portland again toward their final destination. The goods designed for Siletz agency afford a still more marked instance of mismanagement. They have been transported from San Francisco to Salem at a cost of about $75 per ton, and now the most economical way to get them to their destination will probably be to ship them back to San Francisco again at a like cost, and thence direct to Siletz at a cost of about $76 per ton. * * * I shall not write this letter to the inordinate length necessary to point out all the failures or swindles, but a few of the most glaring must suffice. Merrimac prints are named in the invoices. This, as is well known, is the most costly sort of calico, and the prices paid have corresponded with the invoice quality, but not a yard of Merrimac calico has ever been put in the package. On the contrary, the article shipped has always been of a very inferior quality, such as can be bought for 25 or 30 per cent. less than the Merrimac, and is worth to the Indians who are expected to consume it less than half. The article shipped as cotton duck was of a light, inferior article of common drilling. A considerable part of the thread that was sent out was rotten and utterly worthless. The needles, the buttons, the fish-hooks and lines, were of the most inferior description and of little value to the Indians. Spoons enough were brought to give half a dozen to every one of the tribe, and they were so worthless that the Indians generally refused to carry them away after they had been given out. Fancy mirrors costing $5 were sent; they proved to be little looking-glasses about two inches in diameter and worth absolutely nothing to the Indians. A lot of steel hoes, handled, proved to be little affairs intended for the use of some delicate lady. Scissors, shears, in an inordinate quantity and utterly worthless in quality, were sent. In that the entire purchase showed either ignorance of the Indians' wants or design to defraud them.

On the next page of the report we find the following:

Huntingdon's requisitions of September 24, 1863, were in the Department at Washington when the purchases of 1864 were made, and by reference to Huntingdon's schedule it will be seen that Messrs. Dole and Gordon had as little comprehension of the requisition as they had regard for the law of Congress, which they were palpably violating. Huntingdon sent for small steel plows, and they sent him "fancy mirrors;" he asked for harness for ponies, and they sent him frying-pans and knitting-needles; he asked for axes and grain-cradles, and they responded with scissors and spoons.

Thus it will be seen that purchasing agents, in collusion with swindling contractors, have taken the funds which should have gone to enhance the comfort and develop the industry and secure, as far as may be, the civilization of the Indians, and have invested them in the most worthless and useless articles, and have grown rich, many of them, at the expense of these poor, helpless, ignorant, and dependent people. And this, sir, is the testimony of all men who have investigated this matter. And it is notoriously true that these frauds are still going on. If proof of this be thought necessary, it is at hand.

In 1867 what is known as the "peace policy" was inaugurated, and a peace commission was appointed, consisting of N. G. Taylor and others, who made a report in 1868, in which they say:

The records are abundant to show that agents have pocketed the funds appropriated by the Government and driven the Indians to starvation. It cannot be doubted that Indian wars have originated from this cause. The Sioux war in Minnesota is supposed to have been produced in this way. For a long time these officers have been selected from partisan ranks, not so much on account of honesty or qualification as devotion to party interest and their willingness to apply the money of the Indians to promote the selfish schemes of local politicians. We do not doubt that some such men may be in the service of the bureau now, and this leads us to suggest that Congress pass an act not later than the 1st of February, 1869, when the office of all the superintendents, agents, and special agents shall be vacated.

I do not deem it necessary, Mr. Chairman, to dwell longer upon this branch of the subject. I think no one denies these frauds, and if they are denied the proof is overwhelming. I think all agree that some corrective should be applied. That the most gigantic and unblushing frauds are connected with our present Indian management is a fact too well known to need further proof, and has only to be stated to be believed.

I proceed in the next place to compare the cost of the management of the Indian affairs in the Interior and the War Deparments, and this, sir, is an important branch of the subject; for whatever money is saved to the Government in any of its Departments is saved to the people, from whom at last we receive all our revenues, however much it may be disguised and kept from public view by the mysticism of legislation or covered up by the befogments of congressional enactments. And however little the country may know of the methods by which the money necessary to carry on the machinery of Government is raised, still when we arrive at the truth, it all comes either directly or indirectly from the pockets of the laboring people. They at last bear the burdens of Government whatever they may be, and therefore the question of expenditures is to the people a vital question.

Now, sir, I submit that if it can be shown and is true that our Indian affairs can be as well managed (not to say better) by the War Department and at a less cost to the Government than in the Interior Department, then it is clearly our duty to make the proposed transfer. I subjoin a table, taken from the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, which I believe to be accurate, which shows that we are now paying each year over $600,000 for officers and employés in and about and connected with the Office of Indian Affairs, the greater part of which can be saved by making this transfer:

Add to this, Mr. Chairman, the following items, taken from the same report, which are also believed to be correct:

We may add in this connection the printing in the bureau, which furnishes an item of $45,000. This is divided between one hundred and fifty papers, making an average to each of $300. By reference to the official register it will be seen that one paper received $5,639.44, another $4,469.56, four over $2,000 each, six over $1,000 each, and eleven over $500 each, and twenty-four over $100 each. If the transfer is made, the whole advertisement for the Army and Indians can be made together and a large part, if not all, of the above sum may be saved; but, to be safe, we will put the saving here at $25,000. Add this to two-thirds of the cost of the agencies, which it is believed can be saved, and we have the neat sum of $425,938. There can also be saved large sums in the transportation of supplies and in the purchases made by the Government. We think it will be a safe calculation to put this at $500,000, making the total thus saved about $900,000, if not $1,000,000.

Now, sir, this amendment proposes, not to abolish these agencies, but to fill these places by Army officers, who are already under pay by the Government, and to have this large amount of printing done in connection with the printing done for the Army, and to make the purchases for the Indians and transport supplies to them by the admirably arranged system employed by the War Department to supply the Army. Why, sir, those who are most strennously opposed to this transfer admit that the Indian Bureau has never had the same facilities for purchasing and transporting Indian supplies that the War Office has for furnishing the Army with supplies.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in his report for 1877, says upon this subject:

The Indian Bureau has never had an adequate appointment for making large purchases and for transportation of the articles to the distant parts of the country. The Quartermaster and Commissary Departments of the Army have such appointments in complete organization, through which the War Department would be able to purchase, inspect, and transport supplies required to subsist the Indians and fulfill the treaty obligations with much more regularity and system than is possible for this bureau as at present organized.

Can any one doubt, therefore, that it can be done much more cheaply than it is at present? I feel confident that the reasons in this respect are greatly in favor of the War Department.

I know, sir, it has been said, and I suppose will be repeated in this discussion, that the supplies furnished the Army by the War Department cost more than those furnished the Indians by the Interior Department. I shall therefore anticipate this argument, and answer it in advance, and I have no doubt I shall be fully able to show that for the same character of supplies it is not true. I undertake to say that the articles of beef and flour, (which are mainly referred to as showing this,) which are furnished to the Indians, are greatly inferior in quality to that furnished the Army, which in itself is quite sufficient to show that the seeming difference or real difference, if you please, is not attributable to the extravagance of the War Department as compared with the Indian Office, but that the difference in price, whatever it may be, is attributable solely to the difference in the quality of each. It is well known that the beef furnished the Army is and must be of the very best quality. The cattle must be of certain age, weight, and condition, else they are rejected, after the closest and most careful inspection. In proof of this I refer to proposals for beef issued by the chief commissary of subsistence for the Department of Dakota in April, 1877, which is in accordance with the Army Regulations as contained in General Orders No. 27, and which is a specimen of all proposals for that purpose. It is as follows:

PROPOSALS FOR BEEF CATTLE AND FRESH BEEF.

OFFICE CHIEF COMMISSARY SUBSISTENCE, DEPARTMENT OF DAKOTA,
Saint Paul, Minnesota, April 26, 1877.

Sealed proposals, in duplicate, will be received at this office until three o'clock p. m., Tuesday, May 29, 1877, for furnishing the subsistence department United States Army with good fat beef-cattle, delivered by September 1, 1877, or at such other period as may be determined upon hereafter, as follows:

* * * * * * *

The cattle must average about ten hundred and fifty pounds, live weight, and be steers from three to seven years of age. All classes of wild cattle, including "Cherokee" and "Texas," as well as all under three or over seven years old, all falling short of nine hundred pounds gross weight, and all bulls, stags, and cows will be rejected.

* * * * * * *

CHAS. MCCLURE,
Captain and Commissary of Subsistence, United States Army.

From which it will be seen that cattle only of a certain kind will be received, and all bulls, stags, and cows and all classes of wild cattle are expressly excluded, and nothing but "steers" of certain age, weight, and condition will be accepted. So we see that only the very best quality of beef is issued to the Army.

In further confirmation of this view and as furnishing some additional reasons for the difference in the cost of beef furnished the Army, I refer to the following letter of General Robert Macfeely, Commissary-General of Subsistence, to Hon. A. M. SCALES, chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, of date March 23, 1878:

WAR DEPARTMENT, OFFICE COMMISSARY-GENERAL OF SUBSISTENCE,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1878.

SIR: Referring to the communication of Hon. A. M. SCALES, United States House of Representatives, chairman of Committee on Indian Affairs, dated March 20, 1878, inviting your attention to the claim set up by the Indian commissioners for 1877, (at page 5 of their annual report,) namely, "that the purchase of flour and beef made by the Indian department and delivered at some points is at less cost to the Government than the same supplies purchased for the Army," and asking if the War Department "can furnish a reason for this difference," I have the honor to inform you that from reports received at this office it appears that the flour purchased by the Indian department is not of the same grade as that purchased for the Army.

An officer (Captain W. H. Nash, commissary of subsistence) who has been inspecting Indian stores and purchasing for both the Indian and Subsistence Departments states, in a telegram received at this office on the 21st instant, as follows:

"Flour offered to me for inspection on contract made by Indian department has generally been inferior grade of 'double extra,' and that purchased for issue to troops has been best grade 'XXXX,' Colorado flour, best made.

"The flour inspected delivered on contract was equal to sample furnished by Indian department. I consider the sample furnished as wholly unfit for issue to any one. Have had the best opportunity of judging of the comparative qualities; have inspected flour for Indian department for nearly two years, and purchased for both departments."

With reference to the difference in cost of beef I am of the opinion that it arises from two causes: one, that at posts but small quantities of beef are purchased by the Subsistence department (the garrisons being small) and generally from the block as required for daily issue, while the Indian department purchases in large quantities, and generally cattle upon the hoof; the other, that the beef-cattle generally purchased by the Indian department are inferior to those purchased by the Subsistence department.

The specifications for beef-cattle to be furnished the Indian department under advertisement of March 30, 1877, (which it is presumed are the specifications of 1874-'75 and 1875-'76,) required cattle "to be steers and cows not over seven years old, to average not less than eight hundred and fifty pounds at each delivery, no animal to weigh less than seven hundred pounds." By the contracts made by the Subsistence department for beef-cattle at the posts nearest the Red Cloud and Spotted Tail agencies in 1874-'75 and 1875-'76, the years referred to in the report of the commissioners, it was stipulated that the cattle furnished should be "steers from four to six years old, the herd averaging not less than one thousand pounds gross, no cattle to be accepted weighing less than eight hundred pounds gross." These cattle were to be delivered when required by the commanding officer for expeditionary purposes or for temporary camps in the vicinity of the posts. The contractor might not be required to furnish any, and he might at short notice be required to furnish a considerable number, while the numbers contracted for by the Indian department were large and specific.

From the above it will appear that a comparison of prices alone will not enable one to decide as to the cheaper prices and economy of management of the two Departments in the purchase of flour and beef.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. MACFEELY,
Commissary-General of Subsistence.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

Now, sir, in regard to the beef furnished the Interior Department for the Indians, we have the concurrent testimony of a number of gentlemen upon this floor, who live upon the border and are familiar with the subject, that it is of the most inferior quality. The cattle, including bulls, stags, wild cattle, and hornless cattle, "Cherokee," and all sorts of cattle of different sizes, ages, and conditions, are furnished in large herds and upon foot. It is reasonable, therefore, to conclude that they can be and are furnished at a cheaper rate than cattle of superior quality, and furnished in smaller quantities. Sir, in order to show that the methods of purchasing beef for the Indians and the quality furnished have not been satisfactory to the Indian Office itself, and as showing also the power and influence of the "Indian ring," I quote from the report of the board of Indian commissioners, made by Mr. E. M. Kingsley, chairman of the board, to Hon. Clinton B. Fisk, dated January 8, 1878, which is as follows:

BEEF.

This branch of the Indian service has ever been difficult of control, requiring the greatest vigilance in its management. Contractors are fertile in resources, "well up" in all the artifices of obtaining favorable contracts and skillful in methods of advocating their schemes.

When perchance a clerk urges a modification of a beef contract, whereby a less expensive grade of cattle is to be accepted; or when an Indian agent reports that an inferior article of flour has been delivered, and carelessly yet carefully suggests that the department shall "get even" by receiving more of the same article; or when a petition bearing the autographs of a score of public men is presented asking the department to transfer its operations to divers points remote from the seat of Government, it is safe to assume that the mysterious organization or circle of organizations, ubiquitous and strategic, whose articles of federation or confederation have never yet been given to the public, known to fame as the "Indian ring," has neither forgotten its cunning nor ceased its activities nor spent its vital force.

The beef transactions of the year have been much like those of former years, except in the noticeable particular of irregular conditions, found in the contracts, as to average weights of cattle, the percentage of tare by which net weights are ascertained, and the relative proportion of steers and cows constituting a proper delivery. These variations are concessions to contractors equivalent to an increase in prices paid, and should be discontinued or granted in extreme cases with an equitable reduction of the price.

Indeed, sir, it is an admitted fact that the beef furnished the Indians is of inferior quality and does not admit of argument, for when a fact appears argument ceases. And after all, when you compare the figures, the difference in the price of beef furnished these different departments is not as great as one would imagine after so much talk by those who urge this as an insuperable objection to this transfer. But in order to give a fair statement of this matter, and to give gentlemen who have not had the time to investigate this question an opportunity to judge fairly in reference to it, I read a statement of the cost of supplies purchased by the War Department and by the Indian Office, which may be found on page 5 of the ninth annual report of the board of Indian commissioners for 1877, and is as follows:

This table is published by said commissioners to show the difference in the cost of supplies purchased by each Department, and from which they deduce the argument of extravagance upon the part of the War Department as compared with the Indian Office. But it will be observed that, considering the quality of the supplies purchased by each, the difference is not as great as at first supposed, and, in my judgment, leaves the argument in favor of the economy of the War Department. But, to pursue the question of the character and quality of the supplies purchased by each Department a little further, I call attention to the following statement of Captain W. H. Nash, commissary of subsistence United States Army, addressed by him to General Robert Macfeely, Commissary-General, and by him transmitted to Hon. A. M. SCALES, chairman Committee on Indian Affairs. He says:

OFFICE DEPOT COMMISSARY,
Cheyenne, Wyoming Territory, March 21, 1878.

SIR: Referring to your telegram of this date I have the honor to state that during the past eighteen months I have inspected for the Indian department over 1,500,000 pounds of flour. A portion of this was purchased in open market by me at the request of the Hon. Commissioner of Indian Affairs. All that I have purchased in this way has been a XXX grade of flour far superior as to quality to sample furnished me by the Indian department. That portion of the flour offered on contract made by different parties with the Indian department has been inspected in accordance with sample furnished me by the department or its agents. It has invariably, with one single exception, been an inferior grade of XX flour, at least 25 per cent. inferior to the flour graded as XX in the East. It has been flour that I would not touch at any price for issue to troops. When the flour offered for inspection was equal to the sample furnished me I had no alternative but to pass it. During the same time I have, under instructions of the chief commissary of subsistence of the Department of the Platte, purchased in the neighborhood of 1,000,000 pounds of flour for issue to troops in this military department. This flour has been of one grade only and that the best made in Colorado, what they grade as XXXX. It is far superior to flour furnished by the Indian department in every respect.

My opportunities for judging of the comparative qualities of the two flours have been of the best and I do not hesitate to say that the flour I have been called on to inspect for the Indian department, offered on contracts, has been of such inferior quality as to be comparatively worthless, and unfit for issue.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. H. NASH,
Captain, Commissary Subsistence United States Army.

To the COMMISSARY-GENERAL OF SUBSISTENCE, U. S. A.,
Washington, D. C.

A true copy:

R. MACFEELY,
Commissary-General Subsistence

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Office Commissary-General Subsistence, March 26, 1878.

This statement, Mr. Chairman, fully explains and illustrates the boasted economy of the Indian Office in the purchase of the article of flour, and while it may be true that the War Department has paid a little more for flour than the Indian Office has it is also true, if this testimony can be relied on, that while the very best grades of flour have been purchased and issued to the Army, the poor Indian has been fed upon stuff that was not fit, scarcely, to be used as food for swine. It seems to me that further testimony upon this part of the subject is quite unnecessary.

But, sir, we are not left in doubt nor driven to speculation upon the subject of the cost of the management of Indian affairs under the control of the War Department and of the Interior Department. It will be remembered, as I have already stated, that previous to 1849 the War Department had exclusive control of Indian affairs. Let us compare the cost for eleven years previous to that time with the cost for ten years since, and also the seven years just previous to 1877, and we have the following results: from 1839 to 1849, inclusive, the Indian department cost $17,611,837.98; from 1850 to 1860, inclusive, it cost $34,169,799.82; from 1870 to 1876, inclusive, it cost $44,303,332. This will make an annual average cost for the seven years of $6,329,-047, or about $23.05 per capita, which shows that the cost of Indian management under our present system is nearly or quite double each year to what it was under the management of the War Department.

This exhibit is taken from an able and exhaustive speech delivered by Hon. J. W. THROCKMORTON in the Forty-fourth Congress upon this subject, and is quoted as "entirely reliable" by the Committee on Indian Affairs in its majority report upon the bill recommending this transfer. Now, sir, if it is true (and I think I have shown it) that the War Department can and will administer our Indian affairs as cheaply and as economically as the Interior Department, and if it is true (and I have no doubt of it) that we can by this transfer save to the people of the country the large amount of money which it requires to pay the commissioners, agents, &c., connected with the Indian Office by filling their places with men of equal capacity and fitness, who are already being paid and must continue to be paid by the Government, I ask, is there any good reason why this transfer should not be made? I can see none. But it is argued that to make this transfer simply amounts to a declaration of war against the Indians, and looks finally to their utter extinction. If I believed this to be true, or if I believed it would have that effect, I would not hesitate to declare this amendment infamous and its advocates heartless and cruel.

But, Mr. Chairman, what are the facts of history in reference to this point, for unfortunately for the perpetrators of this idea we have a history bearing upon this very point? As I have before stated, for seventeen years just preceding the year 1849 the management of Indian affairs was exclusively under the control of the War Department, which takes us back to 1832. From that time up to 1849 we had war with the Seminoles, with the Creeks, and the Black Hawk Indians. Since that time, and partly under what is known as the "peace policy," we have had the Sioux war of 1852-'54, which is estimated to have cost from $20,000,000 to $40,000,000. In 1864 we had war with the Cheyennes, which cost us near $40,000,000. In 1866 we had another war with the Sioux in Dakota. In 1867 we had another war with the Cheyennes, and in 1877 we had another war with the Sioux, and also the Nes Percé war, to say nothing of the troubles with the Navajoes, and with the Indians upon the Pacific coast. For these statistics and figures I am indebted to the very able report written by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, [Hon. A. M. SCALES.] So we see that the facts do not sustain the arguments on this point made by the opponents of this measure.

In addition to this, according to the statement of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in his report in 1868, it costs us the lives of about twenty-five of our soldiers to kill one Indian. If this be true, it occurs to me that with this record before them the Army would not be very desirous of provoking a war with the Indians, but would rather avoid it as a matter of safety to themselves. But it is said that the very presence of our soldiers among the Indians has a natural tendency to create bad blood and produce disturbances, and is a source of irritation to them. I cannot believe this to be true, Mr. Chairman, and yet I may admit it and still show that matters would be no more unfavorable to the maintenance of peace than now, for it is known that our Army is already stationed among the Indians and near the agencies in order to maintain peace and good order, and necessarily so, too, because we all know that not a single Indian agency could stand a single day among the wild tribes were it not for the presence of the Army, which serves to inspire a wholesome fear in them and thus preserve peace. No, no, Mr. Chairman, it is not the presence of soldiers among the Indians that produces war. It is the presence among them of unprincipled white men, speculating adventurers, dishonest agents, and a horde of thieves and scoundrels, who are engaged in stealing the very bread which they have to sustain life, and are attempting to take from them the very homes that afford them shelter; and seeing this, the Indian, like the white man, "strikes for riddance," and at once the cry is raised that they are murdering our citizens.

And without knowing or caring what the real facts are, our Army is at once sent against them, and to save themselves from extermination they are forced into negotiations with the Government, the result of which is generally that the Indians are compelled to surrender their territory and abandon their homes, and seek shelter somewhere else, there to remain only until the avarice and cupidity of our own people see in this new home a chance for peculation and gain; and again under this pretended "peace policy" the necessity at once arises to remove the Indians to some distant and barren country in order that peace may be secured between them and these speculating adventurers. And this, sir, is done in the name of "God and humanity," under this civilizing and christianizing policy called the "peace policy." Verily, it is a peace policy, but it is the peace of death to the Indian.

Sir, to my mind the meanest and most contemptible of all God's creatures are those long-faced, sanctimonious gentlemen who, invoking the sanctity of our holy religion, take up their solemn march to the home of the Indian with the ostensible purpose of elevating him in the scale of humanity but with the real purpose of robbing him of his scanty living and dispossessing him of his humble home. That there are some good men, Christian men, who go as the agents of the Government among the Indians with honest and pure motives and who are actuated by the loftiest ideas of philanthropy and religion I have no doubt; but that there are a large number of others who are moved by no higher motives than the most selfish and sordid desires I have as little doubt. Sir, there is no man who has a higher respect for a true Christian, one who seeks to humanize, moralize, and Christianize a fallen and degraded people, than I have. The man who quits the endearments of home and family, of civilization and refinement, and goes among the wild and superstitious red men to elevate them and do good to them, deserves the respect and good-will of all just men. But the miserable wretch who seeks to hide himself under the cloak of religion in order to steal and plunder deserves the execration and scorn of all honest men.

But, sir, I pass from this unpleasant view of the subject and return to the point which I have more particularly in hand.

Now, sir, why should not our unemployed officers be required to perform the duties now performed by these Indian agents? I believe, and think there can be no doubt, that they are quite competent to do so. Large numbers of them are on the retired list, but are able to perform this service. Many others have nothing to do, for we have, I think, 1 officer to about 6 men in the Army. They are all under pay, and really the country has no other use for them now. We have peace within all our borders. No foreign foe threatens us; no internal strife annoys us; we are at peace with all the world. The Army is no longer needed in the States to control elections and disperse Legislatures; but, thank God, the States are free once more and the people thereof are free to administer their own domestic concerns in their own way. The Southern States are once more regarded as upon an equality with the other States of the Union, except perhaps by a few misguided and narrow-minded men in Congress. A common flag, the emblem of our nationality, if that be the proper word, waves over the people of all the States in a restored Union, and universal peace and harmony gladden the hearts and inspire the hopes of the people everywhere, and really we have nothing for our Army to do except to prevent incursions and quell disturbances among the Indians and to guard and protect our Texas frontier from raids by Mexican banditti. Why, therefore, should we not save to the country the large amount of money which it requires to defray the expenses of our present Indian management by transferring the duties to those who are already in the employ of the Government and must be paid in any event?

Nor will it necessitate an increase of the Army, for I have already shown that our Army is idle, and our soldiers have but little duty to perform; and, in my judgment, it can well discharge these duties, and then leave us room for a large reduction in our Army.

I have thus far, Mr. Chairman, spoken of the general scope and meaning of this amendment, and have tried to answer some of the objections which are urged against the transfer. I come now to speak of one particular feature of the amendment, which I regard as of the gravest importance. I refer to section 9, which is as follows:

SEC. 9. That it is hereby provided that all religious denominations shall enjoy a free and equal right to erect and maintain church and school buildings on any or all Indian reservations, and shall not be molested in their religious or philanthropic efforts to advance the Indians in moral, religious, and literary culture, but shall all equally and alike be perfectly free and encouraged in the prosecution of their civilizing and educational efforts.

Under what is known as the "peace policy" it is the practice, as is well known, to allow a particular religious denomination to nominate an agent for a given reservation, and the agent thus nominated is appointed in accordance with the wishes of such denomination of Christians, and put in charge of the agency. Now, under the well-understood conditions of our present policy, (and the custom has become so universal as to have the force of law,) no other denomination of Christians can go upon that reservation, either to preach or teach their particular religious faith, but are absolutely prohibited from doing so; and for attempting to do so, I am told that some have been forcibly ejected from the reservations. Thus the Government has "farmed out," so to speak, our Indian reservations to different bodies of Christians, and is forcing the Indians to accept the views of that particular denomination or have no religion at all. All of which, in my humble judgment, is a virtual violation of the first amendment to the Federal Constitution, which declares that—

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

Now, while this regulation of which I speak may not be in violation of the words of this clause of the Constitution it certainly does infringe upon the intent and spirit of it, and is clearly violative of the genius of our institutions and ought not to be tolerated. Sir, if there is one right secured to us by our Constitution which we prize above another it is the God-given right to worship our Creator according to our individual conceptions of the teachings of His Word. Acting upon the idea of this high personal and individual prerogative, our fathers have incorporated in the organic law of the land as one of the fundamental ideas of free republican government that there shall be no established religion in this country, but every man's conscience is left free to embrace that form of religious worship "which seemeth right unto him." And shall we deny to the poor Indian this highest and dearest right ever secured to intelligent creatures? Sir, for one I can never consent to it, but rather would I open the doors wide and let all religious people "of every name and order" have free access to the Indian as well as to all the balance of the world, and I would protect each and all alike in their great work of Christian charity. And whether this amendment passes or not, I trust we shall pass some measure by which our present system upon this subject shall be abolished. It is proving a positive curse to the Indian race and a disgrace to the country.

Sir, after long years of experience what have we accomplished in the way of civilizing the Indians? Our efforts have been almost fruitless. It is true that a few tribes are progressing in the arts of civilization. Agriculture, education, morality, and the Christian religion are fostered and encouraged by a few tribes of Indians, and for their progress in these respects they are entitled to the highest credit; but a large majority of the tribes that were wild when we began to treat with them are wild and nomadic still, and will continue so under the present management until the injustice and cruelty of the present system shall finally extinguish them altogether. I repeat, sir, that our management of the Indian question is a failure. I doubt very much whether we shall ever be able under any system to bring the Indians into full and complete harmony with the habits and customs of civilized life. They will always feel that the restraints of civilized and domestic habits are fetters that bind them, and they will be restive and uneasy; and, like the bird that has been accustomed to the freedom of the air when caged and fettered will fret and flutter to be again free, so will these wild Indians ever long to throw off the restraints of civilized life and return again to their native habits.

But, sir, the dictates of a common humanity require that we shall do something to better their condition from what it is now. I believe myself that the best thing we can do is to place them under the restraints and obligations of law, and throw around them the protection of law; and to this end I am in favor of territorializing the Indian country, and thus make it an integral part of this Government, throwing around the Indians the strongest and most effectual safeguards which are necessary to protect them in all their rights of person and property and maintaining their tribal relations, but at the same time make them amenable to law, and try to raise them to the dignity of men, and eventually to citizenship. Sir, it seems to me that we shall be compelled eventually to do this, but for present relief I think this amendment is a move in the right direction. The tide of civilization has driven the Indian step by step toward the setting sun, until now he is met by the returning tide from the Pacific coast, that is pressing him hard from the western side, and between the two he will inevitably be crushed to death unless the strong arm of the Government shall be stretched forth to help him and to rescue him. I see no better or more effectual mode of doing this than by the strong arm of law. Give him a government that can and will protect him, while at the same time it demands from him respect and obedience. In this way, sir, it seems to me the "Indian problem" will be solved.

I have now said all I desire to say upon the pending bill. If I have not succeeded in convincing a single mind that this transfer ought to be made, I have at least given what I conceive to be a fair and what I know to be a candid statement of the question; and in my own mind there is no shadow of doubt about the propriety of the proposed transfer.

If, Mr. Chairman, we have in the past acted in bad faith toward our red brethren, if we have violated almost if not quite every treaty we have made with them; if we have violated our trust as their guardian and trustee; if our cupidity has enabled us to see a virtue in violated pledges and broken promises, and we have discerned no wrong in driving them from the homes of their fathers and the land of their inheritance, it is at least our duty to see that in future something like justice shall be extended to the remnant of a once powerful but now greatly enfeebled and dependent race. Let us adopt a policy founded in justice, moderation, and truth, and then with the firm and steady hand of a Christian people let us stand by that policy and see that all our obligations to these people are honestly and strictly enforced. Let us have no more of the vacillating policy of the past toward them, but with a firm purpose to do right stretch out the great, strong arm of the Government over them to protect and encourage them, and thus hold out to them the light of hope, that in coming years they are to find in us their real friends and protectors, and not their enemies and despoilers.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of half past four having arrived and the House heretofore having determined at half past four it would take a recess on this day until half past seven o'clock, the committee will rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that according to order the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 4867) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I desire now, Mr. Speaker, to move that general debate on this bill be closed with the session to-night.

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman can give notice.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. No, I prefer to make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot recognize anything except the motion to take a recess, because the House has ordered the taking of a recess this day at half past four o'clock until half past seven. The hour of half past four having arrived, the House will take a recess without a motion.

Mr. BURCHARD. I will move that the House take a recess.

The SPEAKER. According to the order heretofore adopted the House will take a recess at half past four.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Before the House finally takes a recess I desire to make the additional motion that the debate to-night be limited to the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. BURCHARD. I hope not, but that gentlemen may have an opportunity to address themselves to any other subject.

Mr. MORRISON. Let the session be to-night for debate only, no other business to be attended to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can be made on the meeting of the House this evening.

Mr. FINLEY. I understand that the motion is to limit the session this evening to debate on the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will entertain that motion this evening.

Mr. MORRISON. If it is not entertained now we do not want it at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The order of the House for taking a recess at half past four o'clock is absolute.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The design is, then, that the evening session is for debate only, on the Army appropriation bill, no other business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. BURCHARD. I object to that, because if gentlemen who are present do not wish to speak on the Army appropriation bill and there are others who wish to address the House on other subjects I do not think they ought to be prevented from doing so.

Several MEMBERS. That is not objected to.

Mr. BURCHARD. Why not let them go on if there are no members who wish to speak on the Army bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made to the motion of the gentleman from New York, and the Chair cannot entertain it except by unanimous consent.

And then (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House resumed its session at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to call up the special order, House bill No. 4414, and to move to dispense with its first reading. I have no objection then to yielding to gentlemen who desire to proceed with the discussion of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HOUSE. Will the gentleman yield to me to offer a resolution?

Mr. EAMES. I move the business of the session this evening be limited to debate on the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not proper in form. The House may resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole to consider that bill.

Mr. EAMES. Then I make that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the bill referred to by the gentleman from Illinois is the unfinished business.

Mr. CARLISLE. What is it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 4414) to amend the laws relating to internal revenue.

Mr. EDEN. That is not the unfinished business.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I rise simply to state this: when it is understood the regular duties of the session are in progress, when votes may be taken, it is certainly no more than right the question should be raised as to the want of a quorum for the purposes of legislation. If we can resolve ourselves into the Committee of the Whole so men may talk without votes being taken, without the question of a quorum being raised, thereby giving relief to the ordinary session of the day, I shall have no objection to wait so long as gentlemen may have remarks to make; but if it is attempted to bring up any bill of any importance to the country and to detain the House with only fifteen or twenty members present, it seems to me to be a perfect farce to continue without the presence of a quorum.

Mr. BURCHARD. The evening sessions for this week were set for current business with the understanding that if the House desired to conclude the business of the session in time to adjourn some time next month it was necessary members should be present.

It was on my suggestion that evening sessions were appointed for this week for current business. That was the order of the House, and I gave notice I should call up this bill. I do not, however, desire, if gentlemen have any objection, that action should be taken on it to-night. I merely desire that the bill should be called up, and having submitted what remarks I have to make upon it, I will then yield for a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Army appropriation bill; so that this bill which I have reported shall be the unfinished business, having preference over every other except the bill relating to interstate commerce, in charge of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. HARDENBERGH. If it is understood, as would seem to be the case from the slim attendance given at our evening sessions, that the object is merely to allow members to express their views on current questions of legislation, it is of course entirely unnecessary that there should be a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from New Jersey makes the point that there is not a quorum present, he can either make a motion to adjourn or move a call of the House.

Mr. EDEN. I move that there be a recess of ten minutes that it may be seen if a quorum will assemble.

Mr. BURCHARD. I think I was recognized by the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] was recognized.

Mr. BURCHARD. I would ask my colleague [Mr. EDEN] if he is not willing that I should call up this bill and submit what remarks I have to make upon it.

Mr. EDEN. I am entirely willing that the House should resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Army appropriation bill. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has the floor.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Let us hear the gentleman from Illinois, and after he has submitted his remarks, if no quorum presents itself, we can then adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to call up the special order, the title of which will be read by the Clerk, and that he be allowed to submit some remarks in connection therewith. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I withdraw any objection so far as I am concerned.

There was no further objection.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the title of the bill called up by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 4414) to amend the laws relating to internal revenue.

Mr. BURCHARD. Mr. Speaker, the number and frequency of changes in the revenue laws is often commented upon with disfavor by the commercial world. Such changes are, however, to some extent unavoidable.

The amount, character, and subjects of taxation necessarily occupy attention and require examination at each recurring session of Congress. The annual expenditures cannot be adjusted to the same constant sum; they vary from year to year, with the changing needs of the public service. The revenues also expand or contract with the rise or fall of prices, or from any cause that affects business prosperity, or that enlarges or lessens the consumption of taxable commodities.

The questions, then, of the expenditure and of the collection of revenues are subjects of continuous and paramount consideration. The duty of Congress in the one case is to see that appropriations shall be adequate yet economical; in the other, to "lay and collect taxes" that shall be sufficient but not excessive, and to adjust the burdens of taxation fairly and impartially upon those who ought to bear them.

The expenditures for the fiscal year commencing next July will be for interest and principal required to be paid upon the public debt under existing law, about $130,000,000; pensions will require nearly $30,000,000, and other expenditures, including those for the collection of customs, will amount to $110,000,000, making a probable aggregate expenditure of $270,000,000. As the refunding of the bonded debt into bonds bearing a lower rate of interest proceeds the annual interest charge will diminish.

The Treasury receipts for the last fiscal year lacked but $1,000,000 of $270,000,000, this estimate of probable expenditures. The Secretary announces an expected revenue from the following sources for the ensuing year, equaling the total receipts of last year:

Customs	$133,000,000
Internal revenue	120,000,000
Banks	7,000,000
Miscellaneous	9,000,000
Total	269,000,000

It may be reasonably anticipated that present taxation, unless materially modified, will meet the necessities of the public service and the payments required by law to be made upon the public debt.

The reduction of interest by refunding will permit a corresponding reduction in taxation.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

An examination and revision of the laws relating to customs and internal revenue was undertaken by the Committee of Ways and Means soon after its organization. The consideration of the internal revenue, its administration and taxation, was assigned to a subcommittee consisting of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] and myself.

Two bills have been reported from the committee. Apprehending that there would be differences of opinion in regard to subjects and rates of taxation, proposed changes were arranged and examined under two divisions, one relating almost exclusively to the administration of the system and the collection of taxes, the other to the modifications of rates or changes in the objects of taxation. The result of our labors, conjointly with those of officers of the internal revenue, in revising the machinery of internal taxation is now before the House in the bill under consideration. The propositions adopted by the committee affecting rates and subjects of taxation have been embodied in a bill reported by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] and is on the Calendar in Committee of the Whole.

Internal taxation is an essential part of our revenue system. Customs duties cannot be relied upon to meet the necessary expenditures for the support of the Government and payment of interest on the debt unless imported commodities now free are made dutiable. Until the public debt is paid off taxation of domestic commodities or of persons or property seems to be an inevitable necessity. Indeed, internal taxation, excise duties upon spirits, fermented liquors, and tobacco, will probably continue a permanent part of our taxing system. In the revision of these laws the committee have regarded the system as permanent, not temporary, and the modifications they suggest are intended to lessen some of the hardships and rigors of its provisions, and at the same time promote greater efficiency and certainty in collecting the taxes it imposes. The committee have acted in harmony with the Internal Revenue Bureau and nearly all the amendments have the approval or assent of the Commissioner.

The nature of these amendments, their scope and effect, can be more advantageously explained when under special consideration, and I will not anticipate that discussion. The admitted permanency of this system and the revision of laws relating to its administration necessarily suggest an examination of the subjects of internal taxation and the rate to be imposed on each.

Can reductions be made without lessening the revenue? Can changes be made that will more justly distribute the burdens of taxation?

SUBJECTS OF INTERNAL TAXATION.

The internal-revenue receipts for the last fiscal year were from—

Spirits	$57,469,429 72
Tobacco	41,106,546 92
Fermented liquors	9,480,789 17
Banks and bankers	3,829,729 33
Penalties, &c	419,999 41
Adhesive stamps	6,450,429 15
Articles and occupations formerly taxed but now exempt	238,260 55
Total	118,995,184 25

Propositions to modify or reduce these taxes have been continuously made and submitted to the committee. A change in the rate of tax or its entire repeal has been asked on every subject of taxation but fermented liquors.

The House has passed its judgment upon the question of reducing the tax on distilled spirits to 50 cents per gallon, and settled it for this Congress if not for the future. I have heretofore expressed my opinion that the tax is not above the revenue point; that it can be and is now nearly all collected, and that there should be no reduction of the rate. I presented fully the reasons and the official statement of the production of distilled spirits and of the collections of taxes under different rates, which supported my views, and I will not now trouble the House with a repetition.

TOBACCO TAX.

Manufacturers of tobacco have been more restive under the tax on that article than any other class compelled to advance the tax before selling their goods. No rate yet established by law has been satisfactory to them. They resist the continuance of the present rate of 24 cents a pound and insist upon a reduction to 16 cents per pound, as the highest rate the article ought to bear.

The Representatives from the tobacco-growing districts have introduced numerous bills and petitions for this reduction. They complain that the tax falls heavily upon the producer and operates injuriously against his interest. They affirmed that the tax affected consumption and depressed the price of leaf-tobacco. To satisfy myself on these points I requested a careful examination to be made by the officers of the internal revenue to ascertain the number of pounds and the taxes paid upon manufactured tobacco and snuff in each year under different rates, and procured from the Bureau of Statistics a statement of the quantities of leaf-tobacco exported and the price. I will submit them for publication with my remarks on this subject. The average prices on exported tobacco have been under different rates as follows: From 1866 to 1868, average tax 34 cents, price 12.4 cents; from 1869 to 1872, average tax 27 cents, price 10.55 cents; from 1873 to 1875, tax 20 cents, price 10.5 cents; from 1876 to 1877 tax 24 cents, price 10.3 cents. The tax does not seem to have had the effect to raise or lower the price, for the difference between the quotations of 1868 and of 1877 is about the difference between the purchasing power of the current dollar. I have grouped these figures in one statement so that the relations of the tax to the consumption of manufactured tobacco and the price of exported tobacco can be conveniently compared:

	Cents.		Pounds.	Pounds.
1863	10.90	$2,613,438 61	23,660,056		12½ to 28
1864	11.35	7,327,618 98	63,372,426		10½ to 20
1865	22.08	8,300,372 55	36,639,020		11 to 43
1866	34.77	13,038,095 73	35,748,351	190,626,248	9½ to 17½
1867	33.68	16,043,842 50	45,635,581	184,803,065	10½ to 14½
1868	33.56	15,692,415 77	44,900,840	206,020,504	10½ to 14½
1869	27.01	17,371,063 04	62,602,577	181,527,630	9 to 11½
1870	26.91	24,300,483 42	90,288,082	185,748,881	9½ to 11
1871	26.87	25,360,539 67	95,135,504	215,667,604	8 to 9½
1872	25.81	24,570,775 59	95,219,319	234,936,892	8½ to 10½
1873	20.38	23,397,858 22	114,789,208	213,995,176	10 to 12½
1874	20.36	21,938,955 59	107,747,691	318,097,804	8 to 11½
1875	21.10	25,200,759 51	119,435,874	223,901,913	12½ to 18
1876	24.24	26,755,740 20	110,380,602	218,310,265	9½ to 14½
1877	24.23	28,148,767 90	116,146,103	282,386,426	8½ to 13½

An examination of rates, collections, consumption, exports, and price seems to establish the following conclusions:

First. That the present rate yields the largest revenue, that of the last and preceding years exceeding all previous years in amount.

Second. The exports vary with the increased or diminished yield of the yearly crop, and the price is determined by the quantity grown rather than by the domestic consumption of manufactured tobacco.

The committee were divided in their opinions as to the effect of the tax, and a majority favored and directed a reduction of the tax.

One local hardship resulting from the tax, was urged with greater force. In the region where tobacco is chiefly grown, capital is not abundant.

It is asserted that the tax is a serious burden to the southern manufacturer, who must sell on credit as the practice of the trade and of the wealthier competing manufacturers of the North compels him to do.

It is claimed that the loss of annual revenue occasioned by the proposed reduction to 16 cents will not exceed $5,000,000. Past collections do not establish this conclusion. The revenue from tobacco would be reduced nearly one third, or over $8,000,000 annually.

BANK-CHECKS.

The committee were urged to repeal the tax on bank-checks. They are a tax on the business of the country and the affixing of the stamp, the penalties for the omission, the trifling amount collected upon each check, and the annoyance and inconvenience often thereby occasioned do not justify the continuance of this tax as a permanent source of internal taxation. But though each transaction collects but two cents, the payments made by checks are so large that as near as can be ascertained $2,000,000 is annually obtained in this way. It has not seemed to the committee advisable to recommend the repeal of this tax at this time.

MATCHES.

The tax on matches is another tax excessive in rate and imposed upon an article in universal use. It is indirectly a personal tax, collected alike of rich and poor. But as it is advanced by the manufacturer, affixed before being put upon the market, and is unconsciously repaid by the purchaser who lights the match, there are none of the annoyances attending the use of bank-checks and no frauds in its collection. The committee have left that tax undisturbed.

BANK TAXES.

Another tax of larger magnitude affecting $700,000,000 of capital, and business transactions represented by more than $1,000,000,000, is the tax upon the capital and deposits of banks.

The total national taxes paid by banks in 1877 were over $11,000,000. I submit an exhibit of them:

Federal taxes on the banks, 1877.

	No. of banks.	Taxes on circulation.	Taxes on deposits.	Taxes on capital.	Total taxes.
State and private	3,803	$5,430	$2,896,637	$927,661	$3,829,729
Savings	717	....	474,903	....	474,903
National	2,080	2,899,037	3,445,252	654,636	6,998,926

Against the tax upon bank capital it is forcibly urged that this is almost the only national tax upon capital, that there is no reason why capital invested in this business, identified with and essential to the prosperity of the country, should be specially taxed and other forms of capital be exempt.

It is claimed that the tax on deposits is not a tax on the property or resources of a bank but upon its indebtedness to depositors; that taxing debts, what is due to another, is not a just subject of taxation, and that this at once is admitted when a bank becomes insolvent and has nothing with which to pay depositors. As bank accounts and credits are used in carrying on all kinds of commercial business and in forwarding and exchanging commodities, these taxes fall upon business, increase its burdens and hazards, and impede the production of wealth.

This source of revenue affords nearly $7,000,000, and to relinquish so large a sum would necessitate the discontinuance of a portion of the annual payment upon the public debt required by the sinking fund or the collection of a corresponding sum from some other source. The committee in the bill relating to rates of taxation recommended and provided that bank deposits actually taxed as against one bank should not at the same time again be taxed when redeposited in another bank. The committee proposed to change bank taxation only in this respect, which would seem to be a fair and equitable provision if the taxation of deposits is to be continued.

Although opposed to reducing the tobacco tax, I agree with the action of the committee in proposing to compensate the reduction by maintaining the revenues from some other source should such reduction be made.

SINKING FUND.

I disagree entirely with the chairman of the committee [Mr. WOOD] as to the propriety or policy of neglecting to provide sufficient revenue to meet the sinking-fund account. Its establishment was the commencement of the elevation of our credit which has reduced the rate of public interest from 7.3 per cent. in 1868 to 4 per cent. at this time. The annual payment of the amount it requires upon the principal of the debt, with other means Congress should adopt, will without doubt enable the Government to convert all its outstanding bonds above 4½ per cent. into bonds bearing 4 per cent. To purposely suspend the annual payments upon the public debt required by the sinking-fund law would be a reversal of the policy of the Government by which its credit has been so much improved and the rate of interest reduced. In 1875 the taxes on distilled spirits, tobacco, sugar, and other articles were increased solely to provide for, or in the language of the act, to further protect, the sinking fund.

To be free from debt should be the aim of a nation as well as of an individual. A national debt is not a national blessing. The interest is a tax upon industry and labor. It is better to reduce and finally extinguish the principal than to pay a lighter annual sum in perpetual interest. Such was the view of the early statesmen of this country, and a sinking fund was established that ultimately wiped out the national debt growing out of the war of the Revolution, amounting then to $75,000,000.

Nations with the best financial standing provide and maintain a sinking fund. Great Britain, Belgium, Netherlands, Prussia, Denmark, Sweden and Norway, Switzerland, Canada, and Brazil, consider it wise policy. In Great Britain a fixed sum is set apart each year.

If not a violation of public faith, it seems most unwise at this time to suspend the sinking fund.

A measure now in Committee of the Whole authorizing the deposit of savings in the Treasury and their use in redemption of 6 per cent. bonds will, I believe, if it becomes a law, within three years secure the refunding of all the outstanding 5 and 6 per cent. bonds. The saving of annual interest it would effect is seen in the following statement, based upon the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury in his last report:

Statement showing the condition of the bonded debt and amount of saving by interest thereon if converted into 4 per cent. bonds.

Of the bonded debt, $465,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds are now redeemable. By refunding them, as wise legislation and prudent financial management ought to enable us to do, over $9,000,000 of annual interest could be saved before the end of the next calendar year.

The 4 per cent. bonds are at par and are being taken for safe investment. If the national credit is maintained, a surplus of revenue set apart to apply as required by the sinking-fund law, and permission be given to the people to deposit their small savings in the Treasury, all the 6 per cent. bonds and possibly the 5 per cent. bonds can be refunded by the time they become redeemable in 1881.

With the public credit higher than any of the nations of the earth, except Holland and Great Britain, with 4 per cent. bonds at par, with $700,000,000 of 5 per cent. bonds and $750,000,000 6 per cent. bonds, all redeemable at the option of the Government within three years, interest and policy unite with the obligations of honor in demanding the maintenance of the sinking fund and thus securing the speedy refunding of these bonds into bonds of a lower denomination and saving on bonds bearing 4 per cent. interest $22,000,000 annually.

SINKING-FUND LAW.

What is the sinking fund and what does the law require?

The present sinking fund was created under the act of February 25, 1862, section 5, as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin, or in notes payable on demand heretofore authorized to be issued and by law receivable in payment of public dues, and the coin so paid shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year from the 1st day of July, 1862, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

Third. The residue thereof to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

It is simply the payment within each year of 1 per cent. of the outstanding debt and of the interest upon sums thus previously paid.

The total payment upon the debt in interest and principal is not increased from year to year, but somewhat diminished. The 1 per cent. payment upon the debt grows less and the sum previously paid for interest is paid a part on the reduced interest and the remainder on the principal.

The interest paid by the Government in 1867 amounted to the sum of $143,781,592. In 1872 the interest account had become reduced to $117,357,840, while the sinking-fund payment amounted to the sum of $32,248,645, making the total payment for that year on the principal and interest $149,606,485. This was but $6,000,000 more than the interest paid in 1867. In the last fiscal year, five years later, the interest payment had become reduced $20,000,000, being $97,124,512 and the sinking fund was computed to require $33,729,833, making the total payments for that year on the debt, principal and interest, $130,854,848, and the total payment required for interest and sinking fund for 1879 is computed to be $129,876,848, $20,000,000 less than paid six years ago.

With reduction of rate of interest, increase in wealth and population, and actual reduction in amount annually required for both sinking fund and interest, it becomes easier to raise and pay the required amount.

If reductions are made in either internal or other duties, and other taxation can be substituted that will not burden industry and check enterprise and that will not diminish the use of comforts, why hesitate to look to such source for the means of extinguishing the debt?

I insist here, as I insisted in the Committee of Ways and Means, that the proposed reduction of the tobacco tax is unwise. But if the House determines that the reduction should be made, some other tax as little burdensome should be substituted.

INCOME TAX.

Various bills were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means proposing the collection of a tax from incomes.

The House itself voted upon the question and the following resolution received 165 votes in its favor to 89 against its adoption:

Whereas in the present condition of public distress it is important that the wealth of the country should bear a fair proportion of the burdens of taxation: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be, and are hereby, instructed to report a bill imposing a graduated tax upon the excess of incomes above a reasonable minimum to be fixed by law, and the said bill be reported at the earliest practicable moment.

It was a decided expression of the sentiment of the House and a virtual instruction to the committee.

The justice and propriety of an income tax depend upon what are deemed the proper subjects and modes of taxation. It is a fundamental principle, almost an admitted axiom in economic science, that the burden of government support should fall with equal weight upon the recipients of its benefits.

The Government affords its citizens protection in their personal and political rights. For its own maintenance it exacts contribution of personal service or material aid, according to its needs. It protects the right to life and liberty. It secures the possessor in the use and enjoyment of property, and in the use of his faculties for its accumulation. The tax or contribution required in return for this protection, to be equal and just, should be so apportioned that its burden will be the same to all. This equality does not consist in such apportionment of the contribution that the same amount of service or material aid shall be exacted from each.

Equality of contribution is not equality of burden. The latter must be adjusted to each citizen so that its weight will be proportioned to his ability to bear it. In personal service required for military defense the able-bodied citizen only is subject to be summoned, and others are excused. So, in apportioning taxation, the amount exacted should be adjusted according to the ability of the citizen to contribute.

National protection of life and liberty is extended over all, but to require the man who is able to earn a bare subsistence to pay as much as the man whose annual accumulations are millions of dollars would most oppressively adjust the burden of taxation.

The tax in the one case deprives of necessary comforts; in the other, after the full enjoyment of such comforts, it only lessens the expenditure in luxuries or limits investment for further gains. The one must suffer actual physical discomfort, the other loses no necessary enjoyment.

The personal rights of each citizen are the same without regard to possessions, but the protection each receives in his rights of property increases with increase of worldly goods. Property should then pay its share of taxation, and the burden of Government support be adjusted and apportioned to each according to the amount of his possessions and his ability to contribute.

A New York paper, the Monetary World, publishes the following:

NEW YORK MILLIONAIRES.

No street in the world, except possibly in London, represents in the short space of two miles and a half anything like the enormous aggregate of wealth represented by Fifth Avenue (New York) residents between Washington Square and Central Park. We give hap-hazard a few names:

Mr. Rhinelander	$3,000,000
Marshall O. Roberts	5,000,000
Moses Taylor	5,000,000
August Belmont	8,000,000
Robert L. and A. Stuart	5,000,000
Mrs. Paran Stevens	2,000,000
Amos R. Eno	5,000,000
John Jacob and William Astor	60,000,000
Mrs. A. Stewart	50,000,000
Pierre Lorillard	3,000,000
James Kernochan	2,000,000
William H. Vanderbilt	75,000,000
Mrs. Calvert Jones	2,000,000
Mrs. Mary Jones	2,000,000
Mr. James Gordon Bennett	4,000,000
Mr. Fred. Stevens	10,000,000
Mr. Louis Lorillard	1,000,000

Surely this wealth accumulated and held by eighteen families ought to pay its proportional share of the governmental expenses. The net incomes above all deductions and exemptions of the 74,337 persons who in 1872 paid $8,416,685.87 tax of 2½ per cent. upon their incomes of the preceding year amounted to $336,667,435, and if we add the $2,000 income each was allowed to deduct amounting to $148,674,000 we find that less than 75,000 persons had incomes aggregating $485,341,435. This just equals the earnings of $9,706,828,700 capital invested at 5 per cent. Their average incomes were over $6,500.

In European countries a portion of their revenues is derived from a tax on property. Russia collects one-fifth of its taxes in this way. France levies a property tax, while Great Britain, Prussia, Italy, Sweden, and the cantons of Switzerland levy a tax upon incomes. In 1875 Italy collected from incomes $40,000,000, Prussia $8,000,000, and Great Britain $21,500,000.

THE BRITISH INCOME TAX.

The income tax has been in operation thirty-six consecutive years. The highest yield was in 1856 and 1857, when the rate was 16d. a pound. The receipts, rate, and limitations in the last ten years are shown in this table:

Financial year.	Annual receipt.	Rates.	Limitations.
1868	£6,184,000	5d. a pound.	On incomes of and above £100, with an abatement of £60 on incomes under £200.
1869	8,618,000	6d. a pound.
1870	10,044,000	5d. a pound.
1871	£6,350,000	4d. a pound.
1872	9,084,000	6d. a pound.
1873	7,500,000	4d. a pound.	On incomes of and above £100, but with an abatement of £80 on incomes under £300.
1874	5,691,000	3d. a pound.
1875	4,306,000	2d. a pound.
1876	4,109,000	2d. a pound.
1877	5,280,000	3d. a pound.	On incomes of and above £150, but with an abatement of £120 on incomes under £400.
1878	5,920,000	3d. a pound.

In the several States of the Union taxation is assessed almost exclusively upon property including money and credits. Federal taxation falls chiefly upon persons instead of property; it is almost wholly paid by individuals in the increased cost of the clothing they wear, and of articles they eat, drink, and consume. Apportioned by families it amounts annually to $30 each. Nearly all the receipts into the Treasury, except from fees, coinage, sales of public lands, and bank taxes, are collections of customs or internal taxes upon articles of personal or household use.

Not one-tenth of the $270,000,000 of annual revenue is levied as a tax upon property or capital. The remaining nine-tenths, amounting per family to $27 for each, is collected on the following articles of personal use:

Tobacco	5 00
Sugar	4 50
Woolen goods	3 25
Cotton and linen	1 75
Silk	1 50
Crockery and glass	50
Other articles	3 00

PROPERTY SHOULD BEAR A PART OF FEDERAL TAXATION.

The annual Federal tax is less than 1 per cent. of the total wealth of the country. It is urged with great force that property does not pay its fair proportion and the tax imposed upon property is not equally distributed, for while bank capital and deposits pay over 1 per cent., other property pays much less than $\frac{1}{10}$ of 1 per cent. or wholly escapes. Yet the Federal expenditures are incurred for the security of property as much as for the protection of personal rights. Foreign intercourse, public improvements, and an Army and Navy are maintained on account of the former as well as of the latter. Payments upon the principal and interest of the public debt amounting annually to $130,000,000, inure to the benefit of property; for the debt itself may be considered as a mortgage upon the wealth of the country which the property ought to pay.

It is claimed that under a law properly framed taxing incomes, gains, and dividends, the wealth of the country would pay an increased amount of the annual tax; but still far less than its just proportion. The railroads, whose stockholders and bondholders might be taxed 2 per cent. on interest and dividends paid, could not justly object or complain. Their property in time of national disturbance or domestic insurrection is first menaced and requires governmental care. During the last summer the governors of four States found it necessary to invoke Federal aid for the protection of railroad trains and property, and Federal troops were brought from distant points and stationed along the lines of leading railroads to assist the companies in controlling the use of their own property. The net earnings of railroad corporations in 1876 amounted to $186,000,000. Their stock and bonds issued amounted to $4,413,500,743; upon $1,522,536,527 of bonds interest was paid and $937,024,872 of stocks paid dividends. Could these corporations object to a tax of $\frac{1}{10}$ of 1 per cent. on the nominal value of their property?

There is another species of wealth, having no physical existence and not transferable, yet itself often obtained by the expenditure of a large amount of material wealth and itself excelling other forms of wealth in productive power. It is the wealth of intellect, of skill, learning, genius, and culture. Its possessors are men in the so-called professions, skilled in arts—authors and inventors.

The latter through Federal protection often secure large incomes and even amass fortunes. Howe, McCormick, and other benefactors were justly remunerated for their inventions through the protection of patent laws and ought not to complain that the Government requires a small return for its service by their contribution for its ... maintenance.

Evidently, then, after allowing to each citizen a full rational enmount to meet the average necessary expenditures for living, requires a portion joyment, the fairest of all taxation is that ... of the surplus to be appropriated for national support. While the right of the Government cannot be questioned, such limit should be placed as will not discourage the accumulation and saving of wealth or tempt the honest tax-payer to evade its payment. Such are some of the arguments in favor of an income tax.

Under the provisions of such a law there was collected while in force in the United States $347,000,000, and in the year 1866 $73,000,000, and under the law of 1870, in the year 1872, on corporations and incomes of individuals of $2,000 and upward, $14,436,861.78.

It fell upon the wealth of the country, and it was paid, as it should be, in localities and States where the wealth is centered. I submit and append to my remarks a statement from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue showing the number taxed in each State and the incomes reported. I condense and exhibit a computation showing, after adding the $2,000 exempt, the average and total income of each class:

Statement of the number taxed in each State, together with incomes (averaged) and tax paid.

Average incomes.	Number.	Total incomes.	Each.	Tax paid.
$2,400	23,885	$55,404,000	$10	$238,885
3,400	19,202	65,490,800	35	674,170
5,000	13,603	68,015,000	75	1,020,225
9,000	11,555	103,995,000	175	2,022,125
17,000	4,318	73,406,000	375	1,619,250
22,000 and over	2,514	119,030,600	1,130	2,842,030
Total	74,337	485,341,400	.....	8,416,685

One-third of the income tax collected in 1872 was paid by wealthy men whose taxable incomes ranged from $20,000 to hundreds of thousands or millions of dollars and averaged $45,000 for each, and not one-twelfth came from those with incomes less than $4,000. The tax falls mostly upon the wealthy and fortunate, and compels property to pay toward its share of the national expenses.

OBJECTIONS CONSIDERED.

The objections urged against an income tax are not as a rule against its inherent justice, but to its details and administration. To its inequality in taxing but a few of the citizens, it is replied the surplus wealth and large incomes protected by the Government are enjoyed by few. Its unconstitutionality is only urged by the ignorant or designedly unscrupulous objector, for the Supreme Court of the United States has twice expressed the opinion of the court in favor of its validity.

That it is a war tax and not justifiable in time of peace cannot be sustained by logic or authority; and were there any such distinctions between taxes it is successfully answered by the fact that in the last year $150,000,000 of war expenses was paid in the payment of pensions and of interest and principal of the public debt.

The minor objections to the administration of the law do not appear to be unavoidable. They could be urged with force against the law of 1863 which required every citizen, with or without income, to make sworn return, directed the publication of the amount, and necessitated in every collection district a large number of internal-revenue officers, for the collection of this and other internal taxes which in 1866 amounted to $310,000,000, collected by annual or monthly returns, from millions of citizens of the country then engaged in callings, professions, or any business affording them a livelihood.

These provisions are no essential features of an income tax. The law should provide, as the law of 1870 did, that none but those having an income above the taxable limits need return their incomes; that such returns should not be published or even disclosed by the officers.

But, on the other hand it is urged that the tax operates unequally because many that ought to return taxable incomes fail to report or to state truthfully their gains. To inform myself whether this is really the case, I examined the lists returned for one of the collection districts of Illinois, which assessed $8,000 tax in 1872 upon ninety persons. Some may have escaped, but there were few omitted who would be supposed to have had more than $2,000 clear income over all taxes and business expenses, exemptions, and deductions for property taxed under other provisions of the law. That incomes aggregating nearly $500,000,000 were reached and taxed in 1872 which would represent the earnings of $10,000,000,000 capital at 5 per cent. more capital than the entire value of the agricultural wealth of the country, would indicate that the tax is as fairly and generally assessed and collected as the other taxes are. If the tax is sometimes evaded, and the dishonest escape the payment of their just share of Government expenses, this is true of many other taxes.

Moneys and bonds, mortgages and credits representing money due, or loaned, are considered fair subjects of taxation under State laws. The fortunate possessor of moneys and credits must list them for State taxation. But no legislator has proposed to relieve the money-lenders from taxation because some escape. To show how unequally the tax on credits falls, contrast two counties in Illinois, Cook, with 350,000 population in 1870, and Ogle, with 27,500. Cook County returned $77,412 credits of other than bankers, while Ogle County returned $797,593. Ogle County, with one-twelfth of the population, reports and is assessed ten times the amount of credits and money loaned, an inequality of 120 to 1. A similar inequality is seen in returning specific articles. The assessors found but 8,246 watches and clocks in Cook, yet Ogle correctly returns 5,823. Every family in Ogle has a time-piece, while eight families in nine are destitute in Cook or evade the taxes on watches and clocks. The same disparity is seen in returns of sewing-machines. Objection to taxes on account of their evasion applies with greater force to the taxing of many objects now made taxable by State laws.

It is objected that the law will require the disclosure of private business.

The State assessments in every town and city require written lists disclosing not only visible effects and property, but even a statement of moneys in hand and loaned credits and debts. This return becomes a permanent public record, open to the inspection of all.

If credits and money at interest, which to be taxed involve a disclosure of private affairs, are proper subjects of taxation, why are not incomes as well?

The law need not tempt to perjury, for an oath is no essential part of a return.

The English law in force thirty-six years requires only signature to a return of income under penalty of treble assessment for omission to make full return. It collected in the last year $20,000,000 at the rate of 1½ per cent. upon incomes above $750.

The cost of collection, as estimated by the Commissioner, would be $400,000, which is nearly 3½ per cent. on the $12,000,000 that would be collected under the tax.

The collections of customs duties cost $6,500,000, which is 5 per cent. on the amount collected on imports. The collector of one of the districts of Illinois writes me that in his district no additional force would be required to do the work and no additional expense incurred unless for traveling expenses. Similar reports are made to the Commissioner from many other collection districts. The wealthy tax-payers reside mostly in towns. The average number to be assessed in each of the counties of Illinois, except Cook, would be less than twelve. I submit a statement giving the number who paid an income tax in each district of Illinois in 1872:

Statement showing the number of persons in each collection district of Illinois whose taxable income on the annual list of 1872 and on all monthly lists subsequent to the annual and prior to November in such year was (1) $800 or less; (2) over $800 and not over $2,000; (3) over $2,000 and not over $4,000; (4) over $4,000 and not over $10,000; (5) over $10,000 and not over $20,000; and (6) over $20,000.

Pursuant to the expressed opinion and virtual instruction of the House, the Committee of Ways and Means prepared and submitted to the House a proposition for an income tax. It does not, as I believe it ought, conform to the judgment of the House in regard to a graduated income tax. It seems to me equitable and consistent with the idea of any exemption that the rate of tax should increase as the income increases. I could not agree with those members of the committee whose vote placed all incomes at a uniform rate.

It will collect at the rate of 2 per cent. $12,000,000. It requires signature without oath, as the English law has always done. It excuses every person having an income not exceeding $2,000 above all exemptions and deductions from making return, unless notified to do so by the officer having reason to believe he has such taxable income. Comparatively few persons will be required to report. The number taxed in 1871 is reported by the Commissioner to have been 74,775, and in 1872, 74,337; not, on the average, one person in 500 in the community, and outside of the wealthy cities not one person in 1,000. Non-taxable citizens need not fear disturbance.

The objections, then, to the income-tax, to its justice, its inequality, its demoralizing tendency and expense of collection, do not seem to be well founded. It is one of the sources of taxation that our Government should resort to as other enlightened constitutional governments have done whenever the necessities of the Treasury require additional revenue.

If the revenues fall off or reductions should be made or can be made in the duty upon articles of indispensable use and necessary to comfort, a moderate income tax would be as unobjectionable as any for making good the deficiency.

That an income tax would be unpopular with those liable to taxation under it is probable. No one loves to pay a tax consciously. Voluntary taxes concealed, although included in the price paid by the purchaser, are collected most easily and with least complaint.

The propriety of reducing other internal-revenue taxes and compensating with this tax is questionable.

The bill providing for a reduction of the tobacco tax and the collection of an income tax was not adopted or ordered to be reported by my vote. When the reduction of the tax on tobacco to 16 cents had been agreed to by the committee against my vote I voted to compensate the reduction by the income tax as the least burdensome tax by which to make good the loss.

That the reduction of the rate of tax on tobacco would not lessen the cost of its collection, while an income tax would necessarily entail some additional expense, would be an objection to changing from the one tax to the other. Spirits and tobacco also are injurious rather than conducive to health. They are not essential to comfort or sustenance. The tax paid by the consumer is voluntary and not oppressive. It does not seem to have diminished their use. There seems, then, to be no sufficient reason for reducing the present rates, and new taxes need not be imposed to replace the loss of revenue such reduction would occasion. Without a change occurs in the habits of the people, the present subjects of internal taxation will continue to raise $120,000,000, and an income tax is not necessary to make up a deficit that need arise from internal-revenue taxation.

GREEN B. RAUM, Commissioner.

OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE, May 16, 1878.

Mr. EAMES. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois if the bill when it comes up will be open for amendment?

Mr. BURCHARD. Certainly. I desire, if there be no objection, that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. That would bring it immediately before the House for consideration for amendment, and would be equivalent to dispensing with general debate. The bill is in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and, if there is no objection, that order may be made; and then when the bill is once brought up it will be before the House and open for amendment as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I understand that the gentleman from Illinois proposes to limit the general debate on the bill. I think that ought not to be done.

Mr. EAMES. I ask the gentleman from Illinois if I may be allowed to submit two amendments to the bill before the previous question is demanded?

Mr. BURCHARD. I cannot cut off the right of the gentleman to submit amendments and would not if I could.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order of the House the bill is to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] yielded to me to call up the internal-revenue bill. In accordance with the agreement I now yield back to him the right to the floor.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to report from the Committee on the Judiciary a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 3781) providing for the holding of additional terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States in the southern district of Illinois, and for other purposes. I ask the House to hear me but for a moment. The city of Quincy, in Illinois, the largest city in the State except Chicago, and having greater commercial interests than any other city in the State except Chicago, has never had a district court. The people of that section of the country have petitioned for it. The bill establishes no new courts and creates no new offices. I ask that the bill may be read and put upon its passage.

Mr. TIPTON. I must object.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table——

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TIPTON] withdraws his objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has now recognized the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON. I desire to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 1016) to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico, concluded the 4th of July, 1868, and have it sent to the public Calendar in Committee of the Whole, to be considered in connection with the bill H. R. No. 2117.

Mr. EDEN. I understand that the gentleman does not propose to bring the bill before the House for action at this time.

Mr. BUTLER. I object to the reference.

Mr. WILSON. I merely desire to have it sent to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, and Mr. YOUNG rose.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I insist on my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. YOUNG. I desire to have a report printed. I hope that courtesy will be extended to me.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am reluctantly compelled to decline to yield, and for this reason——

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. If the gentleman declines to yield he can be met by the point being made that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will state the reason, and gentlemen will find that there is no lack of courtesy in it. The reason is this: a great many members came to me this afternoon, just before the recess was taken, and asked whether there would be any other business to-night than the Army appropriation bill. I assured them that there would be no business to-night, except perhaps that which has just been called up by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.] Now it seems to me that it would be wrong to break that pledge when the understanding was that we should go on to-night with the debate on the Army appropriation bill. In the morning, when there is a quorum present, I will cheerfully yield for the purposes which gentlemen now ask.

Mr. YOUNG. If the gentleman will hear me a moment I think he will see that it will be entirely proper for him to show the courtesy of yielding now. I have a report here which I wish to present simply for the purpose of having it printed, to accompany a bill which is now in Committee of the Whole. I have for three days been trying to submit this report to be printed. I do not ask that any action shall be taken upon the bill.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The bill to which I refer is one which the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously recommend. It is to establish a court in the city of Quincy, in the State of Illinois. The nearest point at which a court is held is two hundred miles from the city of Quincy. The people of that city and the immediate neighborhood have petitioned in favor of this bill, and the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously recommend its passage. It will lead to no additional expense and I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill is not before the House.

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw my objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] in reference to the Mexican award bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia will again state his request.

MEXICAN INDEMNITY.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 1016, to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868, be now taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to be considered in connection with House bill No. 2117, which is in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. PRICE. What is House bill No. 2117?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. No. 2117) as follows: A bill to provide for the distribution of awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868.

Mr. BURCHARD. I do not know what the gentleman desires to accomplish; but I will say to him that the Senate bill is now in a better position on the Speaker's table than it would be in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a matter for the Chair. Is there any objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection; and accordingly Senate bill No. 1016 was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to state that there is a large amount of money locked up in this bill, which belongs to certain claimants. The money has already been paid to the United States Government by the government of Mexico, and these claimants are entitled to it. I ask that the House now make an order that this bill shall be taken up for consideration immediately after the Army appropriation bill shall have been disposed of. It will not take more than an hour.

Mr. EDEN. We cannot make any special orders now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT MEMPHIS.

Mr. YOUNG. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to submit the majority and the minority reports of that committee upon Senate bill No. 608, authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the custom-house at Memphis to be constructed of Tennessee marble. I move that the reports be printed and recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CUMMINGS and others called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. KENNA. I hope that the regular order will not be demanded until we can make some reports.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The misfortune for the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] is, that the regular order is demanded, and the question is on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KENNA. Then I give notice that I shall raise the question of the want of a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can be tested upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, if any one calls for a division.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. HEWITT, of New York, and it was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.)

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole, and resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4867) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is entitled to the floor.

RELIEF TO LABOR—SETTLING OUR LANDS WITH THE LABORER THE BEST SUBSTITUTE FOR A STANDING ARMY.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no fact more patent, no omen more portentous and alarming to all who carefully examine the state of the country than the great lack of employment for the industrial classes of men and women in the Middle and Eastern States and some two or more of the large cities of the West. By industrial classes I mean those who support themselves by wages for their labor, whether skilled or unskilled.

All classes of employers in every branch of business have been reducing the number of their employés and the rates of wages within the strictest and sternest possible limits, until hundreds of thousands of industrious men and women and their families who have heretofore lived from wages are reduced to the point of starvation for the want of employment, or are barely eking out existence upon the too meager returns from their labor. This state of things has come while bountiful harvests have been gathered in year after year and the granaries of the West are bursting with breadstuffs; her plains and meadows teeming with cattle, sheep, and swine for meat, and all this in addition to the millions of dollars' worth of provisions loaded upon the ships of the merchant marine of Europe to supply the wants of the poor of other nations.

America has substantially no merchant marine by which her own products can be freighted.

On the other hand the storehouses of the East are filled to overflow with every variety of manufacture and mechanical products for the clothing, comforts, and necessities of life for the men of the West, with like addition to large exports of the same articles of manufacture being also made to Europe and elsewhere to supply the industrial classes of other countries with the necessities and comforts of life, which fail to find a market here, even where the necessity for their use is greater, because our working men and women cannot get them. And while our exports of the products of the manufacturing and mechanical industries are increasing, the decrease of imports of like articles shows that there is no demand for like foreign products here.

This, too, has happened while the purchasing power of our currency has been year by year increasing until it is now at a par with gold, showing the anomaly of the purchase of the necessities of life, whether food, clothing, or other comforts, decreasing as the purchasing power of money increases, in a ratio of the want of opportunity for the laborer to earn sufficient on which he can live, and, as if these politico-economic paradoxes were not sufficiently puzzling, they are added to by the fact that all legislative bodies, whether municipal, State, or national, under the name of reform, and as is claimed in the rules of the House, "in the interests of economy," are reducing or cutting off public expenditures only which are the means of living of all the lower class of public servants who hold petty offices and clerkships, and those in the Government service who subsist on wages alone, by the stoppage of public works and improvements, and the reduction of salaries of the petty offices and clerkships only.

Some legislators seem to feel that they deserve the thanks of the country if they can deprive a clerk of his living or can scale down the wages of a messenger or employé of the Government in the navy-yard or arsenal. Legislators have no sufficient excuse for such parsimony, and the motives of their action must always remain open to doubt while their own salaries and those of the higher officials of the Government remain unaffected by legislation in the "interests" of economy, and while, too, the salaries of officers of their own appointment and special dependents are in some cases increased. Such action is neither the true spirit nor the practice of just economy.

In times of public distress, famine, or want of employment of the working classes it has been the experience of all other civilized governments, and supposed to be the wisdom of statesmanship, to afford relief from expenditures authorized by legislation to such classes of the people as live by wages of which they are deprived or who are affected by the blight of non-production of their lands.

A pertinent illustration is found in the actions of the government of England when about the year 1847 the English government spent more than $50,000,000 in employing the laboring-men of Ireland in breaking stones to macadamize roads neither specially useful then nor which have become of special use since, in order that the stipend earned by each might give relief to the industrious workingmen.

The Government of the United States in that crisis of Ireland's need, then controlled by a democratic administration, wedded to the principles of the resolutions of '98, and carried on by the strictest constructionist of the Constitution, passed a resolution to send two public vessels of war to Ireland, loaded with corn and provisions for the relief of the starving thousands of that distressed country, and appropriated the expenses from the Treasury.

The ship of war or peace to carry any relief to the distressed and starving hundreds of thousands of our working people at home has not yet sailed. Not even a railroad car has been hitched to an engine, by the authority of the United States, to carry food or clothing to any of our laborers' starving children in the mines of Pennsylvania, although long trains of cars filled with soldiers have been sent, at the expense of the Government to protect property against the ill-advised, ill-judged, and unjustifiable efforts of the same starving laboring men and women to redress and remedy what they believed to be the great wrong which caused their destitution and distress. No effort has yet been made by the Government to develop the great national wealth of the country in a manner to relieve the wants of the laboring classes, but this House has in this session authorized the employment of two national vessels to convey works of art and specimens of our manufactures and marines and other articles of luxury to the French exhibition, which exhibition will cost not less than $250,000 in repair of the ships and other expenses, while the freightage could have been better done by merchant vessels for $20,000; and in addition we appropriated one hundred and fifty thousand more to show the goods and marines after they got there. How many a poor famishing family would these two vast sums have relieved!

There is enough for all if the food of the West and the manufactures of the East could only be brought together and the laboring-men of both sections earn wherewith to purchase necessaries of life.

Private employers, having neither the capital nor power to develop the resources of the country on a scale sufficiently to lighten the burdens or to alleviate the sufferings of the laborers of the United States, have a valid excuse for reducing all their enterprises to the strictest line of economy and obtain wages at the lowest point; for with all they can do the industrial enterprises are everywhere languishing, and the capital employed in them has been diminished with frightful rapidity, as the terrible records of the courts of bankruptcy show. The conductor of industries, the builder, the manufacturer, the master mechanic, therefore, are compelled to sink the wages of the laborer to the lowest possible point, thus aggravating the difficulty; for the employers are the conduit through which only the wealth produced by labor as the fountain-head must be at last distributed and accumulated.

Proper economy in public expenditure is just and wise, for those expenditures are supplied by taxation, a burden falling largely upon the laborer at last.

And in a normal condition of prosperity, where the Government is not called upon to interfere in behalf of any class of its citizens either to aid or restrain them in their industries, those expenditures should be reduced to the lowest possible point, and the taxation necessary to sustain them should be so adjusted as to be levied upon the accumulated wealth and property which the Government is instituted in a great degree to protect, and not upon production and the laboring producer, because such producer has nothing to protect, and in times of danger not only is called upon to protect himself but to protect the Government.

In times like the present it would seem to be the duty of the Government in the "interests of economy" ever to so legislate and execute its laws that permanent and substantial relief might flow out to the industrial classes in such form as to make the betterment of their condition both immediate and continued.

I repeat, there is in this country enough natural wealth for all, if it can be, as natural wealth ought to be, put by law within the reach of all.

There is no want of a field for employment for all our labor at just wages in developing our boundless resources. True statesmanship, one would think, would find means of developing the one and to employ the other.

There is an admitted evil in regard to both. Our natural wealth lies dormant, our laborers are idle. The evil being admitted, it would seem to be our duty to find and apply the remedy; but we are here met with constitutional objections that Congress has no power to apply any remedy whatever to this so grave condition of public affairs which threatens even the peace of the country and the integrity of the Government. To some legislators there is always a technical constitutional difficulty in the way of the appropriation of any money by the Government unless it be in accordance with the ideas or for the benefit of the particular section or district which such legislators represent. Then, there being a will, a way is always found. Such legislators are not confined to the present hour.

In 1861 there were those who held it unconstitutional for the Government to maintain the Union and preserve its integrity by arms, and the same men maintained that it was entirely constitutional to overthrow and destroy it by armed forces, and they seemed equally well convinced of the soundness of both propositions. I by no means desire now to argue the correctness of either proposition; but there was a higher constitution—the law of necessity for self-preservation of the life of the nation which raised armies, equipped navies, which decided both those constitutional questions in the negative, and the nation lived and will continue to live in obedience to that higher law so long as common sense, duty to our fellow-men, and humanity govern legislation and have a working majority in the Government of the Republic.

Before we try to provide a remedy we ought to look to the cause and extent of the evil, and generally a remedy will suggest itself which can be applied by proper legislation. Considering the evil before us and the extent, the first question arises, is the evil so great that it has become a national wrong; that is, an unjust burden upon any considerable portion of the people of the country not provided for by existing laws. We find the evil to be of a twofold character:

First. Insufficient employment for labor for millions of men and women who would labor if they could find employment.

Second. Insufficient wages for the laborers who are employed to meet the ordinary necessities, not to say comforts of life. He who labors and produces ought to enjoy.

That these constitute an evil so extensive as to be a public wrong both in the ordinary and legal acceptation of the term need not be argued. This is too painfully apparent to him who reads current history.

If it were necessary to state why it is such a wrong, I say—

First. Because we have a country of unequal richness and diversity of natural resources.

Second. Because our population is but a small fraction of the vast number that such resources are capable of comfortably supporting if properly utilized.

Third. Because our harvest filled our granaries to overflowing, so as to supply Europe.

Fourth. Because our export trade has been larger during the past five years of distress to the industrial classes than any previous period of a like number of years in ratio to the population, especially in articles which are the product of skilled labor.

Fifth. Because the increasing purchasing power of our currency and the high value and great demand for our bonds are evidence of our entire solvency and good credit as a nation, so that we have the means of remedying the wrongs and sufferings of the laborers.

Is it not then a wrong, a grievous wrong, a national wrong, that in our country thus situated there should be a dearth of employment at fair wages for the industrial classes of the country, which are at last the producers of all our wealth, national or private, save that which the hand of God has lavished upon us.

But before we can apply the remedy we must seek some of the causes of this wrong in order to adjust our legislation to meet the difficulty.

It is not easy to answer with such definiteness to this inquiry as we have been able to do the question as to the existence of the wrong. And while the problems of cause are difficult, yet there are some facts which stand out so prominently that the most ordinary mind and common observation can see and comprehend them.

First. The damages accruing to the country from the loss of life and property, both North and South, during the late rebellion, which are represented in a small part only in money value by the sum of our national debt, paid and unpaid, and by the burden of our pension rolls and an army of cripples and widows.

Second. The stoppage of development of our resources as a nation during those four years of war.

Third. The crowding of labor into large cities and manufacturing districts by the inducement of high wages during the period wherein the war appropriations were being expended, which were continued to be poured out for some years after the war in the settlement of claims for war-supplies, which kept up for a long time after the war closed in many employments, especially railroad-building and the diverse industries connected therewith.

Fourth. That the reflux of this tide of prosperity which began in 1873 and created not only a financial panic but an economical panic, until now it has become a habit of mind with the majority of the people to consider not what they shall buy and consume, but what they can do without buying, thus showing the anomaly before referred to of the currency of a country gradually increasing in purchasing power, and the masses of the people compelled to make fewer purchases.

Fifth. Steadily decreasing values of property so that men will make no purchases to which they are not forced, so that money is locked up and hoarded as the most valuable of possessions, and no capital is being invested or employed in industrial pursuits except from necessity of saving that already invested from being lost, thereby throwing vast numbers of those who live by wages out of employment.

Sixth. Under consumption, enforced, not by overproduction, because there is consumed of the productions of the country not what the people need, but only so much as they can obtain.

For example, one ought not to be told that too many shoes are produced in the East when the barefooted men, women, and children of the West do not wear shoes because they cannot get them. The productions of the country are never in excess when the non-consumption of them is enforced upon the people by necessity. Men may be starving in the midst of plenty, as they are now, and bread riots are the logical results.

There are other causes perhaps as patent as those I have enumerated, but I have dealt thus far rather with the proximate causes than the causing cause. That causing cause of all these proximate causes can be shown to be the course of legislation by Congress for long series of years, not in support of the "industrial classes" except in a single instance, but this relief was put almost wholly beyond the reach of the class which it ought to have benefited. Looking through the volumes of the statutes from the beginning, I find the homestead laws to be the only direct legislation in favor of the industrial classes. But the lands donated were quite beyond the reach of the men who should occupy them; for it is useless to tell a man laboring for wages which will not support his family that he can have a farm in a distant territory, thousands of miles away, which he is utterly unable to reach. To offer a man a place for a home while before he can possibly even build a shelter for his family upon it he must starve with his wife and children around him, or while waiting a year at least before his gift farm can be made to produce food, is like the water held in the sight of Tantalus, which he may never reach or taste.

Some means must be found to bring the laboring-man and the land together and to enable him to support himself until he can make that land self-supporting, or the gift is only a pretense.

In the hour that is permitted to me I could not, if it were possible for me otherwise, develop any plan in detail by which this remedy can be applied satisfactorily and economically, and yet I have strong belief that it can and must be done, and I therefore confine myself to an endeavor to arouse the attention of Congress and the country to the wrong to be remedied, the necessity for the remedy, and to the injustice to the industrial classes that some remedy should not be applied.

I have no sympathy with the idlers and criminals, the pests of society. I would suppress them with a strong hand; but to the hundreds of thousands, nay, millions of men, women, and children who would work for their support and become producers of wealth, if they could be permitted, my heart goes out toward them with sympathy and a desire to relieve their distresses which almost unsettles my judgment, but I trust does not warp my reason.

I will not stop long to discuss the constitutional power of Congress to afford this or other practical relief, because the country is approaching a crisis upon this question which if not guarded against and provided for will produce a condition of affairs wherein constitutional considerations will be as powerless as they were in 1861, when the over-riding law of necessity for self-preservation was the only guide for legislation and governmental action in this country; but I take leave to call attention to the settled practice and action of the Government from the earliest times to the present, to show that there has been a practical construction of the Constitution by Congress as well when in the hands of the fathers as in the hands of the sons by grants of public moneys in aid of the acquisition of property and for the improvement of the public domain, which seem to be conclusive upon this class of questions.

First, stand out the homestead laws, which, with all their faults and inability to relieve the present distress, are decisive upon this point. These laws give one hundred and sixty acres of the public lands to the settler upon them. Those lands are public property as much as the public money in the Treasury. Why have we not the power to do something to make that gift of land remedial in this time of present distress?

I point to the innumerable bills introduced for the appropriation of public moneys for private corporations, steamship companies, railroad grants and guarantees, deepening harbors, improving the navigation of rivers, protection of private lands from overflow of rivers, relief granted to the sufferers from the overflow of rivers, as was done a few years ago in the South; payment of private war claims, generally to one section of the country; moneys, credits, and land grants for educational purposes to private corporations; public moneys distributed in charities to the inhabitants of the District of Columbia and foreign nations in distress; maintenance of light-houses, coast-surveys, storm-signals, life-saving stations; fast-mail routes, postal commissions, commissions and appropriations for explorations of all parts of the continent from the Amazon to the North Pole; transits of Venus and Mercury, solar parallaxes, bug and grasshopper commissions, departments for the diffusion of useful knowledge concerning the cultivation of wheat in the West, cotton and sugar in the South, hemp in Kentucky, acclimation of tea-culture, silk-culture, commission upon generation of decayed seeds; commissions to find claims against Mexico, courts of claims to decide disputes as between the Government and individuals; authorizations to the executive departments to adjust every possible claim except the claim of the laboring classes, and that indefatigable body of workers, the southern claims commission, who have discovered enough loyalists who have claims against the Government in the South to have squelched the rebellion, if they had only been there and sat down on it when it was going on.

All these precedents for governmental action are in favor of property in its several forms, but where is the legislation for labor? Indeed, the expenditures and gratuities of the Government in this behalf are greater than the entire amount of taxable property of the country as returned by the census in 1870. Let us examine a few of them.

By the acts of July, 1862, (12 Stats., 492,) and July 2, 1864, (13 Stats., 59,) Congress authorized the issue of guaranteed bonds bearing interest at 6 per cent., currency, payable semi-annually, to the several railroad companies, to the amount of $64,623,000

Upon which, since their issue, Congress has paid, as interest on such bonds 36,212,000

Amounting in all to 100,835,000

These bonds run for thirty years. The United States will have to pay at least the additional interest on them amounting to 62,048,000

Making the total cash grant to the Pacific railroads. 162,883,000

As these corporations issued bonds on their own account to the amount of $186,000,000 bearing a high rate of interest and as the repayment by the corporations has only been made to the United States by transportation service, (about $9,000,000 up to date,) no man can doubt that the bonds and interest paid and payable were in fact a free grant by the United States of $162,000,000 to these roads.

In addition to this vast sum in cash, which never will be repaid to the Treasury unless it be paid from the sales of the land granted also to the corporations, which the companies hold for sale at $5 an acre, Congress has granted to the several railroad companies since 1862 an empire of two hundred and eighty-five millions of acres of public lands, which, at $1.25 an acre, the Government price, would be equal to $356,250,000 for which the companies will realize, at $5 per acre, the lowest selling price of the railroads, $1,425,000,000. To this add the amount of the bonded debt and interest, as above stated, $162,883,000, which will make $1,589,883,000, being an amount nearly equal to the entire bonded debt of the Government now outstanding, the result of the war, the lands thus going to aid railroads more than treble in amount the free homesteads ever settled and making in this class of grants alone a money value almost exactly equal to one-ninth of the amount of the entire return of taxable property in the United States in 1870.

How much capital received of these vast sums and how much labor got for their respective shares and how much those who had neither capital nor labor to give got from these vast grants of land and money can never be accurately known. But one thing is certain, that the industrial classes never got one dollar that they did not work and pay for by their labor. No dividends, no subsidies, no Credit Mobiliers ever come to labor.

Let us take another view of the expenditures of the Government, which I extract from official documents.

Since March 4, 1789, there were paid out of the National Treasury for the following purposes namely:

For War	$4,202,972,000
For Navy	966,780,000
For Indians	171,377,000
For pensions	428,205,000
For miscellaneous	1,341,688,000
For ordinary expenses, Congress, executive, and judiciary	7,111,000,000
Making the total cost of the Government from its foundation until now	14,222,000,000
To this if we add premiums and interest on the public debt	1,867,000,000
We have the total paid out	16,089,000,000

being but a little more than the actual value of the subsidies granted to one class of private enterprises, or at the average rate from the foundation of the Government of $180,783,000 annually. (Finance Report of 1877.

Again, the average amount paid for the last five years, ending June 30, 1877:

Army	$40,962,000
Navy	21,975,000
Indians	6,914,000
Pensions, (incident to the rebellion)	28,815,000
Miscellaneous, (principally war claims)	72,213,000
Congress, executive, and judiciary	171,000,000
Interest on public debt, (incident to rebellion)	102,666,000
	444,545,000
To this add premiums paid for the purchase of the bonded debt in 1873 and 1874, $6,500,000, being for the five years, each	1,300,000
Making the average yearly expenses of the Government for the last five years	445,845,000

Point out in these items, as we have observed in regard to the land grants, bonds and subsidies, any substantial appropriation for the direct benefit of the laborer if you can. Of course it is admitted that the industrial classes reap benefits from these large expenditures, but it must always be borne in mind, I repeat again and again, that every dollar they receive they pay for by their labor after it has been percolated through the absorbing channels of contractors, subcontractors, dealers, and employers. It may be in well-organized society the laborer should always be taken to be but the indirect and smaller beneficiary of the outlay of public money, but the intelligent laborers are beginning to inquire as to the correctness of that organization as they see that other classes of society receive relatively larger benefits, and that while they grow poorer the non-producing classes grow richer.

One will search in vain in the annals of Congress for the successful advocacy of any notable appropriations in behalf of the laboring or for the elevation of the condition of the industrial classes by the direct appropriation of public money. We hear in tariff and anti-tariff debates of the protection of American labor, but the inspiring cause is generally the rival interests of traders, importers, dealers, and manufacturers in the different sections of the country. So far as legislation is concerned, there are but two great classes of the people, the industrial or producing classes and the property-owners and non-producers.

The latter direct legislation and govern the country, honestly in the main it may be, but always with their own direct interests controlling public enterprises and inspiring what they are pleased to call reform. Hence the only passing allusions to labor in congressional debates, except as a sort of side-issue or dealing with it as a cog-wheel in the machinery of trade and for the frequent appeals to the duty of Congress toward commerce and the public creditors, and hosts of interests they are building up from the profits derived from labor.

There is little time or interest expended upon the condition of labor. Of the millions and billions of treasure that have been expended since the foundation of the Government for its war debts and actual Government expenses, or were appropriated in the interests or for the development of trade, commerce, and manufacture, the lion's share went to the non-producing classes, the owners of property. True it is that the Government is mainly employed for the protection of property. As we have observed, the laborer has nothing to be protected. The artisan and mechanic has almost ceased to own property save his experience and skill and physical strength, to expend them for whatever wages he can obtain. And, so far as the United States is concerned, this property of the laborer, or his contracts, or his life are all beyond the protecting power of the national courts. Laborers may be denied payment for labor, and if the amounts are not large enough to give the Federal courts jurisdiction—$2,000 or $5,000 in the Supreme Court—the laborer has no redress there.

The laborer may be deprived of his political franchise by violence and fraud, by combination of the property-owners; and the Constitution bristles all over with technical objections against the power of the United States to punish the wrong-doers. Thousands of them may be slaughtered in cold blood, as they have been recently in one portion of the country, and we find that the courts cannot punish, and that it is unconstitutional to use the Army to defend. But let a few rioters impede for an hour the course of commerce or destroy or threaten the property of commercial corporations, and the Treasury opens wide its doors, the Army and Navy and the whole military power of the nation is called forth under the Constitution to put down the riot, arrest the criminals, and protect the property.

No just or patriotic man will say that commerce or property should not be fostered and protected; and the riot should be suppressed at once at all hazards; and I merely call attention to the fostering and protecting legislative, judicial, and executive care for trade and commerce, wealth, and property, and to the absence of such fostering care for the laborer, the fulcrum of commerce, the producer and creator of all property and wealth, to point the contrast. The laborer supports the capitalist and the "better classes," as they are called, the whole fabric of the Government with the sweat of his brow and the toil of his hands, and either voluntarily or involuntarily maintains the honor of the flag and the integrity of the nation on the field against treason at home and invasion from abroad.

The laborer is the producer of wealth; capital is the receiver and distributer, and there should be no contest but an equitable reciprocity between them. Neither should get more in fair proportion than the other. As the veins and arteries take up and circulate the blood in the nourishment of the human body, so capital ought to circulate wealth by means of the veins and arteries of trade through the body-politic for the nourishment of every part thereof. When the circulation of our blood stagnates, or any organ or member of our body absorbs more than its share, disease ensues, and if a remedy is not applied death follows.

Is there no stagnation now? Is there no disease in the body-politic, and does wealth equally and properly share in just proportion and nourish all the members of the body of the nation, and circulate equally and steadily through every vein and artery, or is it stagnant and corrupt around the heart and the head, leaving the arms and feet cold as in death and the whole body ready to perish? Woe to us if fever sets in and the paralyzed arm becomes uncontrolled by the will and strikes home, scattering confusion, riot, and death.

I speak these words in all soberness and sorrow, because I feel it my duty so to do. I call attention to the wrong and the necessity of remedy. I call upon Congress here and now to apply that remedy at once. We have spent more than a week over a political question which for its utmost can have no significance in affecting the business of the country, being only whether A or B shall distribute the Federal offices. Would that that week could have been devoted to steady careful examination of the dangers which surround us and an endeavor to apply a remedy.

Mark my words, for I desire to be held responsible for them, there is great danger if we allow ourselves to go home and give no relief to the present condition of the country. When the day of reckoning comes, as come it must, how mean and pitiful will our economies in appropriations appear.

I know that these views and the consideration of this subject is not a pleasant one. I neither ask for, hope, or expect applause for presenting them to this House. If I desired that, I would make a speech, if I could, showing how the value of a United States bond in the hand of a foreign banker could be raised 10 per cent. Or how it were possible that a favorite claim of some section of the country could be saddled on the Treasury. Or how the favorite interest of some portion of the country could be subserved by a law adapted to its special interests. Or, if I desired to "bring down the House" in a storm of applause, I would utter some biting sarcasm upon the intellect, or some attack upon the character, of some member of this House.

For myself, let it not be said I have given no plan or details by which a remedy may be administered. Under the rules of the House I have neither time nor opportunity. I have had to beg time for this almost inopportune speech on this bill, for it will be said, "What has this to do with the Army bill?" I saw no other opportunity in which I could call the attention of the House and the country to this great and, to me, seeming impending danger, and it has this to do with the Army bill:

It is claimed that we must have a large standing Army to repress the possible outbreak of the laboring-men, to put them down with the bullet and bayonet, the machine-gun and cannon, if they quit work and strike, and bad men should band together and take advantage of their necessities to inaugurate violence and wrong. Remove the cause and then you will not need the Army. The only suggested need of the Army will cease except on the western frontier.

Instead of supporting four hundred men at the expense of nearly a million a year on the frontier as a regiment, support four hundred families with strong, stalwart workingmen at their heads in place of that regiment, and give them arms and they will protect themselves from your Josephs, your Sitting Bulls, of your Indians wherever they may be found. Settle them together in communities of four hundred families each and they will be your army, not of consumers but an army of producers of larger numbers, each settlement stronger than a regiment.

Exercise the power that the Constitution has given you and make them United States militia for your frontiers, and, unlike soldiers, when they do not fight they will produce, and not eat the production of others. Send out a selected head of a family willing to work, with his wife and children, and give him forty acres of land and only what your soldiers cost you in transportation, clothing, forage, pay, and quarters, and you will have a producer at home to defend himself as our fathers did in New England, as our fathers did in New York, without the aid of any regular army.

Expend the $40,000,000 a year which your Army annually costs you in putting settlers on the lands of the frontier with their families who in years will not only be a self-supporting but a self-recruiting army, which shall add to and not decrease your wealth. Then it will be time to talk about disbanding your regular Army, cutting it down to a few sergeants to keep the guns and carriages in the several forts painted, and only educate your officers and let them turn their efforts to civil life until by the possible contingency of a foreign war they may be called into action at the head of volunteer soldiers on whom you must at last depend.

Depend in the several States upon a well-regulated United States militia, which the Constitution presupposes; and do not let my ear be pained again by hearing it said that militia will not fight, or will sympathize with a mob of rioters. When that hour comes, your regular soldiers cannot be depended upon any more than militia; and the whole history of the armies of the world tells you that the regulars fraternize with the people when the cause of the mob becomes the cause of the people, and the action of the mob is revolution against their oppressors who take away their liberties and their rights.

During the delivery of the remarks of Mr. BUTLER the hammer fell.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has expired.

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended.

Mr. WRIGHT. There are two demagogues in this House, and I hope this one will be allowed to finish his remarks. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman require?

Mr. BUTLER. I will get through as soon as I can.

Mr. BRAGG. I dislike very much to interpose an objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] proceeding further, but there are two other gentlemen who desire to speak to-night.

Mr. BUTLER. Patrick Henry said on one occasion "If this be treason, make the most of it." I say, if this is demagogery, make the most of it.

The CHAIRMAN. How much longer does the gentleman from Massachusetts want?

Mr. BUTLER. Probably half an hour.

Mr. BRAGG. By order of the House the general debate on this bill is to close to-night and there are two other gentlemen who desire to speak to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] withdraw his objection?

Mr. BRAGG. I do not; I insist upon it.

Mr. WILSON. I think the objection comes too late.

Mr. BUTLER, (proceeding with his speech.) The whole fabric of the Government——

Mr. BRAGG. I insist upon my objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. I say the objection comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asked for objection and the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] who was standing on the floor, announced that he objected, which announcement was distinctly heard by the Chair. The Chair appealed to him to withdraw his objection and he declined to do so.

Mr. BRIGHT. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] will withdraw his objection.

Mr. BUTLER. I am now just beginning to speak on the Army bill; but I am not anxious to go on any further and will print the remainder of my remarks.

Mr. WILSON. I understood that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] was allowed to go on, and he began additional remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. It could only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. WRIGHT. The unanimous consent was given.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection was made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG.]

Mr. WRIGHT. The laboring-man has no chance in this House.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will withdraw his objection to the extension of the time of my colleague; no gentleman on the other side of the House has been limited in debate to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the objection withdrawn?

Mr. BRAGG. It is not.

Mr. HANNA. Our side of the House extended the time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] one hour, and it is but fairness that the other side should accord us the same extension to our side.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not a matter of choice with the Chair. The extension of time can only be granted by unanimous consent.

Mr. MARSH. I desire to know if the order limiting debate upon this bill, which was adopted this afternoon when there were very few members present in the House, cannot be reconsidered now?

The CHAIRMAN. It cannot be reconsidered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MARSH. If that order could be reconsidered, I do not doubt that there would be no objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts continuing his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is entitled to the floor for forty-five minutes of the time of his colleague, [Mr. FOSTER.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to occupy the attention of the committee very long. I have no purpose except to address myself very briefly to the subject-matter before the committee, and that is the Army appropriation bill.

I listened with great interest to the discussion of this subject, and especially to the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] who opened the discussion; and in many points of his speech I concur; but there is one main point in the bill upon which I differ from him and from the majority of the Committee on Appropriations. It is the question of the strength of the Army which we ought to maintain. If in anything I have heretofore said or written upon this subject I have unnecessarily or improperly run into partisanship, I shall certainly not do so to-night.

It will be admitted on all hands that the conditions of this country are altogether unlike those of European governments in regard to the character and methods of national defense.

No man can read the tables that record the sizes of the armies of Europe without a sense of amazement at their enormous cost. We are fortunately so situated geographically that we do not need a standing army on any such scale as those of Europe. When I find a country with one-fourth of the population of the United States maintaining an army four times as large as ours, it is with a just ground of pride that I can say I live in a country which, when the peril of war comes, can at once convert the mass of its citizens into a column of defenders and create an army and a navy sufficient to meet the emergencies of a great war.

But while I say that, I recognize the imperative necessity of maintaining a military organization of the best kind known among men; and such an army every patriotic man will agree we ought to maintain. What that army ought to be is a question for fair debate. There have been for many years among military men two theories: one is that we should keep up only a sufficient force in all branches of the Army to meet the immediate wants of actual military service. The other is the Calhoun theory of 1820; indeed it was the theory of Washington; but Calhoun brought it into special prominence and stated it with admirable clearness and force. He said in 1820 that we ought to have an army so organized and disciplined that when a sudden emergency should come upon us it could be expanded by mere enlistment to double or quadruple its size, with nothing in the way of organization to new-model or create.

This has been the received theory of American statesmanship in reference to our Army. I was sorry to see the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] adopt the opposite principle and abandon the plan laid down by General Sherman of an army with a peace maximum of twenty-five thousand, but which can be expanded to two hundred thousand without the addition of a single regiment, by increasing the number of companies and filling the battalions and companies to their war maximum.

Now, it may be that this is too extensive a scheme. It may not be the best; but, in my judgment, a scheme that is capable of expansion by mere enlistments is most economical, is wisest for the country, and therefore the best.

But, laying this subject aside, and with it all questions of Army organization, I address myself for a few moments solely to the question of how large an Army we need. I do not now speak so much of the officers as of the force of enlisted men; though all, I think, will admit that if we continue the skeleton plan we must have more officers than would be barely necessary to command the troops we have. We must have officers enough to command a larger force in case we should find it necessary to expand the Army.

I hope gentlemen will remember the striking fact called to our attention by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MCCOOK,] that in our century of national existence one-sixth of all our years have been years of war, not counting our Indian wars; and we cannot expect to live through the next century with a less per cent. of war years than we have had in the century past.

Now, why do we need an Army? First and foremost, we need it to keep alive the knowledge and practice of military science; and if we knew there would not be an Indian war or a foreign war in our generation, if we knew there would be no trouble on any part of our borders, I should still say we needed an army large enough to keep alive the practical knowledge of military science and art. How large it should be for this purpose, it is perhaps unnecessary to discuss, and it would be difficult to determine; but something of an army would be needed, even were there no immediate danger of war. But we have no guarantee of perpetual peace. We need an army for our great border. Our northern line unites the two oceans. We have had trouble on that border, not only in the way of war, but also in the way of raids that have threatened the public peace. Gentlemen residing near the Vermont line remember well the raids that have happened there and the international difficulties in which we were threatened to be embroiled in consequence. Our southern border, though shorter, is in greater need of military protection.

At this very time the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] tells us of the serious difficulties on his border, where we have a dangerous neighbor—dangerous not because of her great strength—but because she is an ungoverned, ill-disciplined, and revolutionary nation, and therefore all the more liable to disturb our peace. That gentleman [Mr. SCHLEICHER] reports from his committee that from the mouth of the Rio Grande to El Paso a force of not less than five thousand men is indispensable to the protection of the peace of Texas. This, then, is the condition of things on that line, for which we must provide.

We have now a possession that extends almost to the shores of Asia, a possession which, if the great war which is now threatening Europe should come, may require some looking after to take care of our international relations in the troubles that may spring up between Russia and England. Do gentlemen know the striking fact that if a great circle were drawn from the easternmost point of Maine to the westernmost point of Alaska its center would fall in the Pacific Ocean, eight hundred miles beyond the California coast? In other words, the geographical center of the great circle which touches the eastern and the western extremities of our national territory lies almost a thousand miles beyond the border of this continent.

But, leaving out Alaska from the account altogether, the enormous extension of our frontier settlements within the last few years makes old calculations obsolete as a basis for determining the size of the Army. The gentleman from New York very properly said that this was more a matter of posts than of miles; and I wish to call his attention to the test by posts. In 1846 we had an Army of 13,274 men, and at that time we had 10 arsenals and 39 garrisoned posts, an average of 265 soldiers to a post. I take it that nobody then considered our Army too large. That was before the Mexican war was declared, and before any increase of force had been made in anticipation of that war. But not one of those posts was as far west as the center of Kansas and Nebraska.

In 1860 our posts had increased to 109, including arsenals; and our Army it is true was but little larger. But in 1878, taking the lowest figures that have been given, our arsenals are 19 and our garrisoned posts 161; and with our Army at its present size we have about 250 men to each post, a number smaller by 15 than the average number we had thirty-two years ago.

Now, two-thirds of all the posts are west of the hundredth meridian, west of the westernmost post in 1846. The center of gravity of our population is constantly moving westward; but the frontier line of settlement is moving much more rapidly. The pioneers are now scattered throughout that vast interior empire which was an untrodden wilderness thirty years ago; and the necessity of protection against the Indians is more urgent now than then.

Judged, therefore, by the number of posts, judged by the spaces occupied, judged by the line of national boundaries, judged on any of the grounds by which we can measure the required size of an Army, we have relatively a smaller Army to-day than we had in 1846.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. My friend from Ohio has omitted to make a comparison with 1860. If he will refer to that period he will find that the number of men at our posts then averaged a little over 100.

Mr. GARFIELD. In 1860 the average number at each of our posts was about 130 according to my estimate, and was insufficient; but the great interior between the one hundredth meridian and the Sierras was hardly touched by the advancing tide of settlement.

Now, I have been calculating upon the size of an Army as it exists on paper.

I wish to say to gentlemen that it is the opinion of all men who are competent judges of the question that the paper strength of our Army, widely distributed as it now is, must be reduced one-third in order to get its real, effective strength. I believe there is no great manufactory anywhere in the United States, when they have all their machinery running and their hands in full force, whose superintendent will not tell you he must subtract 10 per cent. at least for the casualties which occur day by day. If he has a thousand hands in his employ, when the ordinary loss from sickness and other casualties is taken into account, the effective work per day will not be more than nine hundred. The percentage of loss is much greater in an army scattered as ours is over many thousands of miles.

The reasons for this great reduction of effective strength can be seen at a glance. They are the casualties of sickness from exposure, death and wounds in skirmish and battle; desertion, a most serious element, which does not apply in any ordinary business; expiration of term of enlistment; and finally the necessary loss of time which elapses between the loss of one soldier and the recruiting, drilling and getting to the field of his successor. It takes usually about four months from the time of his enlistment to get a recruit to his post in a state of efficiency. With all these elements taken into the account, General Sherman tells me that he can never reckon the effective force of our peace establishment at more than two-thirds of the paper force. Now if we make our Army on paper twenty-five thousand, its effective force will not exceed sixteen thousand five hundred. If we make it on paper twenty thousand, we must reduce that number one-third to find the effective force. The pending proposition is therefore to give us an army of but thirteen thousand five hundred effective men, which I believe to be a dangerous reduction for the necessities of this nation.

I have mentioned all the leading reasons why we should maintain an army save one, and that I approach reluctantly; but I deem it my duty to speak plainly. Of all the passages in the speech of my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. HEWITT] the one which was to me least satisfactory, both in its statement and its logic, was that in regard to the necessity of an army for keeping the peace within the States. Let me read a sentence, and while I read let us forget party if we can, and everything but the fact that we are American citizens. Let us for a few moments reflect upon questions which may in the near future rise above and possibly for a time overwhelm all political organizations in this country if they are not handled plainly, justly, courageously, by the American people.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] said:

> Now we are told we ought to have a large Army, and a very large Army, in order to put down impending strikes. I take issue with that proposition. It is not in accordance with the theory of this Government that the United States is to maintain an Army for the purpose of restraining any portion of its citizens in their just rights. The right to strike is a just right. No man can coerce another to do work against his will. It is just as sacred a right as the right to employ, if you can find somebody who is willing to hire himself out to you. The wisdom of strikes is quite another matter.

Now I agree absolutely with that statement; but I submit to all who hear me that is not a statement which so far as I know anybody ever controverted in this country. With all kindness to the gentleman, he has set up a man of straw and knocked it down valorously. I have never heard of an American who denied the right of any man to refuse to work. I have never heard of an American anywhere who denied the right of a thousand or ten thousand men to refuse to work unless their wages were increased, or to refuse to work if their wages were diminished. It is a right as broad and universal as American liberty.

But that is not the thing anybody has denounced, so far as I know. The gentleman neither grapples with nor states the dangerous element connected with the subject. I can do as I please about working for you; I can refuse to work at low wages, or high wages, or any wages; but when I unite with others and by force and violence prevent you from working, I have violated your right as a laborer and as a man. The real mischief and wrong attending many strikes has been this: that men who needed the opportunity to work, who were ready to work, and who were reasonably satisfied with their opportunities for work, have been coerced, menaced, driven, overpowered, forbidden to work; and thus men have sometimes been deprived of the free exercise of their right to work because somebody else wanted to manage their affairs for them. That has been the mischief of American strikes.

Now, while I hold to all rights of laborers to manage their affairs, each for himself, I say it, at whatever hazard, the man who lays any obstacle in the way of any American which prevents him from working is a breaker of the law and a violator of the first right of a laborer.

Mr. BANKS. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. BANKS. How is it with capitalists who combine with other capitalists against the employed?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is just as great a violation of the law.

Mr. BANKS. That is just what I wanted to say.

Mr. GARFIELD. And deserving of just as great, and, if possible, greater condemnation.

It is not the strikes; it is not the proper and lawful refusal of laborers to be oppressed by capitalists, that threatens the public peace; but it is the unlawful interference with the rights of laborers, the spirit of mob violence and misrule, a spirit not born on our soil nor in harmony with our traditions; but it is "the red fool-fury of the Seine" transplanted here, taking root in our disasters, and drawing its life only from our misfortunes, which has lately so seriously threatened and may still more seriously imperil the stability of our institutions.

Mr. Chairman, I am a profound, I might almost say a devout, believer in the American idea, that the consent of the governed is the only true source of national authority, and is the safest and firmest foundation on which to build a government. This is the fundamental axiom of our political faith. To question it, is moral treason. To deny it, is political atheism. But we must not forget that a majority, perhaps a large majority, of the thinkers and writers of Europe declare that our axiom is no axiom, but is a delusion, a fatal mistake.

In view of this fact I wish to turn for a moment to a wider and more serious consideration of a question closely connected with the topic I am discussing, a question which has painfully forced itself upon my mind during the last twelve months. I refer to a letter written by the late Lord Macaulay, which probably contains the most powerful indictment ever penned against the democratic principle. I will not read the letter in full, but will state in brief its substance.

When the life of Thomas Jefferson was written by S. S. Randall, a distinguished citizen of New York, a copy of the volume was sent to the great British historian. Macaulay answered, thanking the author for the volumes, but he remarked that he had no admiration for Jefferson. The American expressed his surprise and desired to know the historian's reasons. Thereupon Macaulay, on the 23d day of May, 1857, just twenty-one years ago, wrote this letter, in which he gave his reasons for not believing that Thomas Jefferson was a benefactor of his country or of mankind. His reasons were these: "I do not believe," said he, "that it is possible to establish institutions that will be permanent based upon the votes of people, counted by the head. That proceeds upon the supposition that the rich and the poor, the wise and the ignorant, the virtuous and the vicious, are all counted as equal and endowed with equal political power. That," said he, "is the fatal vice of your institutions that Jefferson founded. Now your country can prosper so long as you have great spaces of unoccupied land, a great West, for your surplus population; but the time will come in your history, when New England will be as thickly populated as Old England; when there will be no more fertile, unoccupied lands for your expanding population.

"Then will come the real strain and test of your institutions. There will be periods of scarcity and distress. Thousands of laborers will be out of work and men will begin to say there is no justice in allowing one man to have a million while another has not a meal; no justice in letting one man ride in his carriage and dine sumptuously while another hears his children cry for bread. And when that hour comes your Government will be brought to its final and fatal test. Then a discontented, hopeless, starving majority will elect the governors of your States, the members of your Legislatures, and your President; and then I expect, if not in this century, certainly in the next, that your country will be as fearfully ravaged as was the Roman Empire by the Huns and the Vandals of the fifth century; only with this difference: your Huns and Vandals will have been engendered by your own institutions. Your Constitution [he says] is all sail and no anchor. There is nothing to stay you. I wish you might have a better fate, but my wishes and my reason are at war. And therefore, believing your fate is certain, I cannot congratulate you upon Thomas Jefferson and the doctrines he taught."

Such, in substance, is the indictment and prophecy which America must answer. With my whole soul, I repel the indictment. Every instinct and conviction of my life denounces the prophecy as false. But what thoughtful man in all our land, who had read that letter, did not remember it last summer, when ten millions of Americans trembled in the balance of uncertainty for days, not knowing whether the torch and blood would mark the pathway of anarchy across our continent, or order and peace would rule? What man, I say, reflected upon the events of that terrible period without remembering the prophecy of Macaulay and asking himself whether the grounds of his faith in the stability of his country was established on a sure foundation?

I say again, I reject the doctrine of Macaulay. I endeavored five years ago, as best I might, to answer it. Perhaps it was a rash attempt; but I based my answer on two grounds:

The first was that Macaulay took no account of the tremendous power of our educational forces. He did not know, he could not know the almost omnipotent power of universal education to enlighten and ennoble our people and fit them for the liberties and duties of American citizenship. In this rests our hope; and while the light of our schools shines undimmed and unclouded upon all our children we may safely count upon centuries of liberty and safety.

My second ground was this: that Macaulay did not know, and it is hardly possible for any one reared under monarchical institutions to understand, that here, in America, there are no fixed and permanent classes. In all aristocracies society is organized on the principle of permanent classes, fixed and rigid as the layers of rock that form the earth's crust. At the bottom, under the superincumbent weight of all their institutions and population, are the laboring poor. The editor of an English periodical uttered a sentence, a few years ago, which makes the blood run cold. It was this. Said he:

> I have studied the agricultural farm laborers of my country carefully for twenty-five years, and I have never known one who was born and reared in the ranks of farm labor that ever rose above his class and became a well-to-do citizen.

Remember that nearly half the population of England are agriculturists, and the laborers in that class amount to not less than three or four millions; they have above them the landlords, and above them the several ranks of nobility, and above them the royal family. The barriers are well-nigh impassable. But, thank God, and thank the founders of our Republic and the later patriots, who have made the truth of the Declaration of Independence a reality, here in America, there are no classes. [Applause.]

Our society does not resemble the crust of the earth with its impassable barriers of rock; but resembles rather the waters of the mighty sea, deep, broad, boundless, but yet so free in all its parts that the drop which mingles with the sand at its bottom is free to rise through all the mass of waters till it flashes in the light on the crest of the highest wave. [Applause.]

There is no boy in America, however humble his birth or in whatever depth of poverty his lot may be cast, who, if he has a strong arm, a clear head, and a brave heart, may not rise by the light of our schools and the freedom of our laws until he shall stand foremost in the honor and confidence of his country. [Applause.]

This is my answer. For these reasons I do not fear the Cassandra prophecy of Macaulay. The time may come when we shall find it necessary to fight for society; and when that time comes, the first signal of the contest will make us one; for all who love liberty ruled by law will spring to the defense of society against anarchy, against chaos, and against the red rule of the torch. To what power shall we look in that struggle to protect and save society if it be not to the Constitution and the strong arm of the National Government?

Gentlemen tell us it is the business of the States to protect their citizens against insurrection and violence. But our fathers provided a stronger defense for moments of supreme peril. I have drawn no fancy picture of remote or impossible evils. The American people are not likely soon to forget the events of July last, when in a great group of States belting the continent from ocean to ocean, the lives and property of many millions of citizens were rescued from sudden and imminent peril by the prompt and effective response of our Army to the constitutional demand of the States for its aid.

Here, Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand the copies of brief but eloquent letters and telegrams from ten great States of this Union, (see note,) and all of them were sent within the space of one week—calling upon the President of the United States for help; ten great States, reaching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, Maryland and West Virginia among them; ten great States, among them California and the empire States of the Northwest, calling for the arms of the Republic to shield and save in their hour of distress.

My friends, had we been at that moment in session do you think we would have voted to decrease the Army to twenty thousand men? Would we not rather have put it up to fifty thousand. I therefore say boldly, while I will do as much as he who will do most to secure the rights of labor against iniquitous laws and against the assaults of capital when used unjustly, yet against all comers I am for the reign of law in this Republic and for an army large enough to make it sure.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from New York—whose material stake in the stability and good order of the Union is much greater than mine—will help to make that stake secure to the whole country, and will consent to let an amendment be made to fix the number of the Army at twenty-five thousand men where it now is, and let the bill be recommitted so that his committee may reconstruct it in harmony with the amendment. The details of organization might then be left to a commission which can report to us at the beginning of our next session. I trust that in these remarks I have wounded the sensibility of no gentleman; for I have spoken no word in the spirit of partisanship.

WHEELING, WEST VIRGINIA, July 18, 1877.

His Excellency R. B. HAYES,
President of the United States:

Owing to unlawful combinations and domestic violence now existing at Martinsburgh and at other points along the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, it is impossible with any force at my command to execute the laws of the State. I therefore call upon Your Excellency for the assistance of the United States military to protect the law-abiding people of the State against domestic violence and to maintain the supremacy of the law. The Legislature is not now in session and could not be assembled in time to take any action in the emergency. A force of from two to three hundred should be sent without delay to Martinsburgh, where my aid, Colonel Delaplain, will meet and confer with the officer in command.

HENRY M. MATTHEWS,
Governor of West Virginia.

President of the United States:

Lawlessness exists in this State to such an extent that I am unable, with the forces at my command, to quell the same and protect the law-abiding citizens in their rights. I therefore call upon you for assistance by furnishing military and without delay. Can the six companies at Rock Island be forwarded to Chicago at once? Domestic violence exists in the State.

S. M. CULLOM, Governor.

SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS, July 25, 1877.

Hon. GEORGE W. MCCRARY,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

Have just telegraphed the President for aid. Want the troops at Rock Island sent to Chicago without delay. Great danger of an outbreak any moment. Please act promptly.

SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS, July 25, 1877.

Hon. GEORGE W. MCCRARY,
Secretary of War, Washington:

The mayor of Chicago is appealing to me for all the troops that can possibly be sent in at once.

S. M. CULLOM, Governor.

LINCOLN, NEBRASKA, July 25, 1877.

SECRETARY OF WAR, Washington:

Would respectfully ask that the troops at Omaha Barracks be not ordered from here at present.

SILAS GARBER,
Governor of Nebraska.

[Telegram.]

MILWAUKEE, WISCONSIN, July 25, 1877.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

There is danger that the labor insurrection may extend to this city; the State has little or no militia that can be relied upon. There are at the Soldiers' Home three hundred old soldiers subject to the rules and articles of war, who can be usefully organized and armed for effective guard duty in case of emergency. Can these men be used as a part of the national force or as part of the State militia?

HARRISON LUDINGTON,
Governor of Wisconsin.

INDIANAPOLIS, INDIANA, July 26, 1877.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.:

In view of the threatened domestic violence growing out of the railroad strike, I request that authority be at once given to the commandant of the arsenal to render me all the aid possible in preserving the public peace.

JAMES D. WILLIAMS,
Governor of Indiana.

Mr. BRAGG addressed the committee. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, in old Egypt kings were worshiped as gods; in imperial Rome emperors were deified; during the Middle Ages kings ruled by "divine right" and in modern Europe by the "grace of God;" in America rulers govern by the will of the people.

Sir, in all monarchical countries armies are maintained to defend the people against a foreign foe and to defend the king against his domestic foe, the people. In our free Republic armies are, and should be, enrolled only to protect us against our foreign enemies.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] this evening most dramatically recited Macaulay's brilliant picture of what in this country will be the result of a redundant population, and his attempt to demonstrate that Mr. Jefferson's fabric of a free Republic would be a failure. So dramatic was the gentleman's rendition of the Englishman's picture that it was difficult to believe that he differed much from the essayist. It is true he told us he did not think the prophecy would be fulfilled for yet one or two hundred years. But with abundant precaution he advocated the maintenance of a large standing army with an elasticity of organization, ready for this emergency yet in the womb of future centuries. He wants the Army kept up as a nucleus around which is to be nurtured an American martial spirit.

Ah! Mr. Chairman, standing armies do not encourage martial spirit among a people. The people forget how to fight when they have hired soldiers to do their battles. Rome ceased to be warlike when her pretorian bands stood guard over her, and she finally bent her knee to them as masters. The mamelukes protected Egypt and her people became slaves. Turkey was protected by the janizaries till the Turk became little better than the eunuch of his harem.

The Swiss protected the Bourbon's France, and Frenchmen became caperers and revelers, till finally awakened from their dream they were baptized in blood and turned to men and heroes. Martial spirit grows under the sunshine of liberty and love of country or of conquest. It perishes in the baleful shadow of a standing army.

Sir, we want no standing army in free America to protect society against lawlessness. The people must protect themselves and will protect themselves. The gentleman may go to his couch and dream rosy dreams. His hundred or two hundred years off are yet far away.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] told us this evening that for long years only one law had been passed for the benefit of the poor man, and that it (the homestead law) was a delusion. Sir, that gentleman struck the key-note. What we want is proper legislation. We want laws for the benefit of the people, and not to enable the rich to grow richer at the expense of the poor.

Taxes come out of the people, taxes are levied upon men. Federal taxes are paid by what men eat and drink and wear, and not a dollar of it falls upon wealth. Change your legislation and you may almost disband your Army. The people are hungry; they are starving; they are discontented; they clamor for work. Give it to them; set them to work and make them happy and contented. This Congress can do it. Start some great public works. Pass House bill 4322 for a ship-canal from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi, and I will guarantee that the people will take it as an earnest of your good intentions. To that I will now address my remarks.

Mr. Chairman, a century ago this year Illinois was organized as a far-off county of Virginia. In 1809 it was created a Territory, and in 1818 was admitted into the sisterhood of States. Ten years later, or fifty years ago, its population was about one hundred and forty thousand, and its northern half, which now teems with a vast and intelligent people, was the home of but few white men. In the northeastern corner of the State, on the southwestern bend of Lake Michigan, at that date was located Fort Dearborn, a small frontier post, guarded by a company of United States soldiers.

Sir, outside the fort were the cabins of a half dozen white men (intermarried with squaws) who eked out a scanty subsistence by doing odd jobs for the people in the fort, and by cheating the Indians who came at stated periods to receive blankets, the gift of the Great Father at Washington, and to trade furs with the resident agents of the American Fur Company for the red man's treasures—whisky and powder.

The fort and these cabins covered nearly all the dry land which lay within several miles. To the east was the great lake, three hundred miles long, sixty miles wide, and nine hundred feet deep. Its fountain waters were plowed once or twice a year only, by a small schooner, which supplied the fort and the fur agency. In all other directions, for hundreds of miles, stretched a wild prairie, low, flat, uninviting, and uninhabited, except by a few scattered tribes of Indians.

Along the lake shore, sir, was a narrow, sandy ridge, a sort of natural causeway, only a few feet higher than the lake. Excepting this ridge nearly all the land for many miles was a reedy marsh or a low prairie, so flat as to hold the spring rains in its tangled grass as in a sponge. A person on horseback, leaving this ridge, found himself during the spring months up to the saddle-skirts in marsh, or floundering along the flat prairie, which at that period of the year was but little better than marsh. And even as late as July, a pedestrian could reach the Des Plaines River, ten miles west, only by wading over shoe-top in water, or by springing from ant-hill to ant-hill, the only dry land near.

Sir, the eye of a prophet alone could have seen here the site of one of the world's great cities.

Immediately under the stockades of the fort lazily lay a small creek, or rather bayou, reaching back from the lake shore a little over a half mile, where it was parted into two branches, one coming from the north, the other from the south, nearly parallel with the lake, and neither over five miles long. That creek lay sullen and black like a serpent sleeping in the marsh. Its average width did not exceed sixty feet, and at its mouth, where the sands were driven in by the lake storms, it could in late summer be crossed almost dry-shod. Its dark waters were rarely disturbed, except by the flappings of water fowls, whose nestings were in the bullrushes along its low margin, or by the silent natation of the muskrat, or by the almost equally silent dip of an occasional red man's paddle.

In more respects than in appearance did that inky bayou resemble a sleeping serpent. Sir, it only required the prickings of man's warming energy to quicken it into a life which would send abroad a commerce far greater than that which floated on the Thames a half century before.

That creek was the Chicago River; to-day it is the harbor of a city of nearly a half million of people—clearing from its piers last year 10,284 vessels, of a tonnage of 3,311,083 tons. It is the feeder of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, the subject of my present remarks. That little creek, which now flows up hill, has been for ages the fast-and-loose link uniting two vast river systems flowing into far distant oceans. It is destined to exercise an influence upon the world's commerce vastly greater than did Rome's tawny Tiber or Egyptian Nilus.

Ages ago that link was fast united. Then it opened or closed as the waters were high or low. Now, since a few shovelfuls of earth have been judiciously removed, it is again permanently united, and Lake Michigan sends a part of her crystal drops to mingle with those of the Father of Waters. Some of us here present will live to see mighty steamers unloading cotton and sugar upon the piers of Chicago, and, taking in the grain of the prairies and minerals from the far-distant Superior regions, will steam away to the Crescent City of the South. And the lakes and the Mississippi, and their peoples, will be united by a bond no more to be disturbed by internecine strife.

Mr. Chairman, I said that fifty years ago only a prophet could have seen at Fort Dearborn the site of a mighty city. But his mantle of prophecy need not have been Heaven-born. It was only necessary that its woof and fabric should be woven of commercial and engineering sagacity united to a close observation of the little bayou and the low divide separating its waters from those of the Des Plaines River close by. That divide was only a few inches above the average surface of the Lake, and in high water the birchen canoe passed freely from one to the other.

Ages ago the great prairie States of the Northwest were a vast inland shallow sea. Its deep pools were the beds of the present lakes. When the bottom of that sea was upheaved and the barriers to the east and south were broken down, the waters of Lake Michigan flowed to a considerable extent, through a long cycle of centuries, through the Des Plaines River to the Mississippi. As the prairies to the south were gradually lifted, and the outlets to the east were deepened, the southern outlet became nearly closed.

Nature thus wrote on that low divide the first engineer's report in favor of a ship-canal to unite the Mississippi and the lakes. She traced along that flat marsh, in the dark waters of that little bayou, the plan for tying the Gulf of Mexico to the Gulf of Saint Lawrence. A gentle breeze parted sister waters in that sullen creek and carried them to far distant oceans, where one would be caught in the frozen grasp of the stream coming down from Labrador, the other to be wooed by the warm embrace of the Gulf Stream, again to be reunited in mid-ocean.

That report was read by our forefathers, and its recommendations were adopted by American statesmen. Perry's victories on the lakes taught them where was to be the true battle-ground in a war between England and America.

In 1814, President Madison, in his message to Congress, recommended a ship-canal from the head of Lake Michigan to the Mississippi; and the Committee on Military Affairs of this House reported favorably the project. But Northern Illinois was then a far-off land. Only two years before, Fort Dearborn had been the scene of the Wyoming of the Northwest. The war was soon thereafter over, and republics are prone to forget in times of peace the lessons of war.

England has not been so forgetful. Her Iron Duke told her, about the same time, that "a naval superiority on the lakes was a sine qua non of success in a war with America." By the treaty of 1817, the two governments bound themselves each to keep no more than one armed vessel of a hundred tons burden upon the lakes. But England soon took steps to prevent that stipulation from being a source of weakness to her. She has at an expense of about $22,000,000 thrown canals eight feet deep around the rapids of the Saint Lawrence, and the Welland Canal from Lake Ontario to Lake Erie ten feet deep. This year the latter is being deepened to twelve feet at a cost of about $10,000,000. And her intentions are to deepen them all to the same depth.

Sir, when the Mason and Slidell imbroglio threatened to precipitate the two countries into war, the London Times said that "the worst part of the struggle would not be on the seaboard, but on the great lakes, and that within a week after the breaking of the ice a whole fleet of gunboats with the most powerful screw-corvettes would carry the protection of the British flag from Montreal to Chicago." The people of our lake cities had to acknowledge that the assertion was not a mere idle boast. England has kept constantly on hand war vessels which could pass through these canals.

Sir, early in the late war one of our brightest military men (Frank Blair) said, on this floor, that "a fleet of light-draught heavily armed gun-boats could in a short month get into the lakes and shell every city from Chicago to Ogdensburgh." We had but one small-arm vessel to cope with this threatened fleet, and there were no means of sending succor to her. Our only hope was in being able to overrun Canada before the ice should give way.

Had war then broken out between England and America, it is not improbable that the lurid flames which swept away so many millions at Chicago in 1871 might have had forerunners all along the lakes.

Washington told us that "to enjoy peace we should be prepared for war." Had we followed his advice by opening a ship-canal from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi prior to the late war, the humiliation of the Mason and Slidell diplomacy would have been spared us, and hundreds of millions of dollars of treasure might have been saved in our military preparations.

Some of our most earnest statesmen were so impressed with the necessity of the means for passing gunboats between the lakes and the Mississippi, that a bill was introduced into the Thirty-seventh Congress to deepen the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and received long and earnest consideration. But the divided nation was then struggling for its life; the grip of a determined giant was upon its throat. Its sinews of war were shriveled; its energies were taxed to the utmost to send men to the field; it could not spare the money or the muscle to dig canals. The project slept till in the winter of 1865, when the war was virtually over, and then a modified bill passed this House. But that bill saddled upon the State of Illinois the bulk of the cost of an undertaking which was wholly national in its character. Mr. Chairman, the Arkansas farmer did not repair the roof of his house because when it rained he could not, and when it was dry it was unnecessary. Must we follow his example or shall we profit by his folly?

But, Mr. Chairman, permit me to go back. During several years after Mr. Madison's recommendation of the ship-canal from Lake Michigan the subject was agitated in Congress and in the new State of Illinois. In 1822 and 1827 it was put upon its legs; surveys were made and land grants were given. It was generally discussed in and out of Congress as a national undertaking. But unfortunately many of our rulers were deeply imbued with that hue of strict-construction doctrine which taught them that salt was necessary to make a water national. They could spend millions to improve a salt-water harbor, but were unwilling to use a dollar to improve a river, though it watered many States. Some of them went so far as to doubt the constitutionality of improving the harbors of the American Mediterranean—our great lakes. The Illinois and Michigan Canal and the Illinois River lay wholly within the limits of a single State and therefore they could not conceive it to be national. Such men as Benton and Silas Wright, however, lifted up their voices in loud declaration of its nationality. Some of the most eloquent utterances of the great Missourian were pleadings in favor of its construction.

Sir, Tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur in illis. The theories of constitutional construction have greatly changed since those great men thundered upon the floors of this Capitol. Could I by some magic touch bring them back here to-day, to say what they said, when you and I were little boys, in favor of this great measure, I would have but little fear of their success. What I lack of their power and ability I shall try to supply by my earnestness.

But, sir, years ago they failed; failed because their giant thoughts fell upon ears already being filled by sectional bickerings. The result was, this great national work dwindled into a State undertaking. The canal was commenced in 1836 and completed in 1848; completed, however, not to float mighty steamers and bristling gunboats, but to tow along the pigmy barge. Even this, however, gave a wonderful impetus to the Northwest. Northern Illinois took at once a giant stride; a stride prophetic of her future destiny. With true instinct of future greatness she has never lost sight of her duty and has already completed two locks upon the Illinois River three hundred and fifty feet long and seven feet deep. She has never lost sight of the fact that that river and the canal are but an arm of the mighty Mississippi.

For many years the canal was fed by lifting into it, by powerful hydraulic engines, water from the Chicago River. But, sir, an empire has grown up along its margins and in its neighborhood. A great city sits at its head, a city of mercantile palaces. It numbers a half million souls. It clears from its piers over 10,000 vessels annually. It receives each year 100,000,000 bushels of grain, more than one-twentieth of all of America's product. The forest sends to her yards its stately monarchs riven into 1,066,000,000 feet of lumber. Four million one hundred and ninety thousand three hundred and six swine last year entered her stock-yards, and 2,983,486 bit the dust within her limits, to be turned into pork, the food of millions in the Old World who battle for the kings who "rule by the grace of God." One million thirty-three thousand cattle pass through her annually to supply the tables of Eastern States and over 310,000 sheep are added to their larder. She pours nearly $10,000,000 of internal revenue into the coffers of the Federal Treasury. Her post-office distributes more newspapers than any other in the country. In letters it is the second and in revenues the third in the land.

Telegrams flit each hour of the day upon a thousand wires, over hill and dale, over mountain and valley, and flash along the stilly floor of the turbulent Atlantic to tell the world what price Chicago merchants put upon a bushel of wheat or upon a barrel of pork. These prices rule in every other mart.

Yet, sir, Chicago is only forty years old. You are in the prime of life, and can remember that in your school days her name scarcely appeared upon your map. Why her great development? What has given it birth? Not her people's energies, but because the place and it peculiar situation have developed the energies of her people. Men build up localities, but localities and their inexorable necessities make men.

Seven and a half years since Chicago lay in ashes. In eighteen hours two hundred million dollars' worth of her property floated over the lake in smoky carbon. One hundred thousand people saw the sun of October 8, 1871, set upon their comfortable homes. The next sunset found them without a place wherein to lay their heads. Yet to-day the city is rebuilt in added splendor and its population has increased nearly 40 per cent. It is true her people are in debt. Thousands who five years since were rich are now bankrupt. But their wealth has only changed hands. The city is there, and her trade has steadily grown during the past four years of disaster.

Sir, Chicago is not an exaggeration of western outgrowth. She has not kept pace with the county tributary to her. Illinois is the central figure of six imperial States. Her population has grown in fifty years from 140,000 to over 3,000,000. In 1877 she grew over 250,000,000 bushels of corn—one-fourth of all the corn grown in the United States. Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, whose virgin prairies, fifty years since, had scarcely been trodden by the foot of a white man, number not far from 4,000,000 people. Michigan and Indiana have over 3,000,000. These six prairie States have a greater population than did Spain when she ruled the world with a rod of iron and when old ocean was grandiloquently styled the Spanish lake. These six States harvested last year not far from 700,000,000 bushels of corn and wheat, nearly one-half of all which was harvested in this broad land. They harvested nearly one-third of all other cereals of the country.

Yet, sir, but a small proportion of the rich soils of these six States is under actual cultivation. Go this coming June and traverse them by rail. Although population hugs the railroads, yet your eye will be gladdened by sketches of thousands of acres golden with wild prairie flowers. An English traveler last year visiting Illinois called her prairies "nature's floral bonanza"

These six States can feed the world. Vast and productive States are yet beyond them. The world is hungry and asks for cheapened bread. How to move the produce of this great grain-producing area is a problem over which thinking men are pondering. A thousand iron horses groan along the iron pathway leading down to the sea. Their insatiable maws exact a burdensome tribute from the field and from the plow. Their hot breath blasts the blossoms of hope and of profit. Their mailed hoof treads down the flower garden and the green pasture. The morning sun catches the farmer at work and its going down leaves him wearied and doubtful. He has no time to store his mind with knowledge or to adorn his home. His tread-mill life begins on the first day of January and it ends not on the last day of December. He sows and corporations harvest.

Sir, water next to air is God's freest gift to man. History goes not back to the day when it was not his smoothest highway. It alone can wash out monopolies. Railroads may thrive along its margins, but they cannot oppress. Rivers and canals may not bear a large amount of freights, but wherever they exist railway charges are light. Within fifteen miles of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, railway freights are 20 to 30 per cent. cheaper than they are farther off. But this canal floats only barges and horses are their motors.

Sir, deepen this canal and improve the Illinois River, as Madison recommended, and then great steamers will take cargoes from the ships of the lakes and will bear them to the far-off South or up the Missouri to the distant plains of the West. Three great railroads start from Chicago; they diverge to the north and the south, but come again together at Council Bluffs. Another farther south reaches Kansas City near by. Trains of from thirty to fifty cars, only a few hours apart, are ever thundering along these lines. They come East laden with grain, with hogs and cattle, and with the treasures of the Rocky Mountains; they go West groaning under millions of feet of lumber and with the fabrics of the eastern work-shops. Two great lines lead to the South; they, too, take and bring their rich freightage.

The Illinois and Michigan Canal to a great extent keeps down the charges of all of these great railroad lines. It competes with them all to a great extent in all heavy goods. Lumber and ready-made houses are conveyed on its barges to the Mississippi, and thence to the decks of steamers to climb high up the Missouri to furnish houses for the settlers of the plains.

But, sir, how small the competition of these little horse-drawn barges compared to that which the steamboat would afford. Deepen the Illinois and Michigan Canal to seven feet and steamers of a thousand tons burden would lay the ships of our fresh-water seas of the North side by side with the ocean ship at New Orleans. Steamers of a lighter burden would ply between the lakes and the far-off Yellowstone. North and South, East and West would be by it bound together.

Sir, is not this a national undertaking? I am tempted here to quote from the great Missouri statesman, Benton. Twenty-nine years ago he thus spoke:

> The nationality of the Chicago Canal and harbor at its mouth are by no means new conceptions with me. The river navigation of the great West is the most wonderful on the globe, and since the application of steam-power to the propulsion of vessels, possesses the essential qualities of open navigation. Speed, distance, cheapness, magnitude of cargoes are all there, and without the perils of the sea from storms and enemies. The steamboat is the ship of the river, and finds in the Mississippi and its tributaries the amplest theater for the diffusion and the display of power. Wonderful river! connected with seas by the head and by the north, stretching its arms toward the Atlantic and the Pacific; lying in a valley, which is a valley from the Gulf of Mexico to Hudson's Bay; drawing its waters, not from the rugged mountains, but from the plateau of the lakes in the center of the continent, and in communication with the sources of the Saint Lawrence and the streams which take their course north to Hudson's Bay; draining the largest extent of richest land; collecting the products of every clime, even the frigid, to bear the whole to market in the sunny South, and there to meet the products of the whole world. Such is the Mississippi. And who can calculate the aggregate of its advantages and the magnitude of its future commercial results?

Mr. Speaker, thus spoke a man whose gospel was the Bible and his country's Constitution. He was speaking to men who on one side saw looming up in the future a mighty southern republic, and on the other to men who saw in the future an eastern empire—an empire of monopoly and gold; an empire whose realm should be America, whose throne would be in Wall street. His words sank deep into the minds of his hearers. But their hearts were not touched. Lust of power and greed of wealth were uniting two diametrically opposed factors. Mammon and ambition united these two factors in violent opposition to his scheme. The one is broken forever. The South dreams not of a separate empire; she has learned, at a cost which the wildest imaginings could not foresee, that the waters of the Mississippi cannot wash the homes of a divided people. The West has learned that gold is the heaviest of all task-masters.

Sir, the Mississippi and its navigable feeders give a water line of nearly twelve thousand miles. They water soil capable of producing nearly every fruit and grain known to the world. The lakes have a shore line of over five thousand miles. Every foot of that shore line except on Lake Superior is as rich as the valleys of India, the home of God's chosen people. The rugged shores of Superior are solid with minerals almost as pure as the product of the furnace.

Mr. Chairman, all of this vast water inland seaboard can be brought into union by a canal thirty-six miles long, and yet our statesmen ask, is it national?

Sir, look again at the railroads centering at the mouth of this canal. Fourteen different roads, whose arms reach over and through all of the grain-fields of the Northwest, center at Chicago. One can read on the sides of cars any day within her limits the names of nearly every railroad corporation of this northern continent. There stands a car belonging to the Central Pacific. Coupled to it is one of the Grand Trunk of Canada. A Texan car is being unloaded, and its stores are being transferred to another, whose ownership is in Baltimore. A switch engine puffs by and crushes a car marked "Jackson and New Orleans" against another labeled "Hudson River." A "Boston" car is coupled to one marked "Northern Pacific."

All of the fourteen roads centering in Chicago, whose connections are like the nerves of the body, leading to every extremity of the Republic, unite, and their rolling-stock is freely transferred from one to another. They all run into a common stock-yard. They all run into the great lumber-yards. They all lie along the huge grain elevators, many of which have storage for over a million bushels each. These elevators handle a car-load of grain as readily as a man can a bushel measure. Deep water washes their walls. A car-load of wheat is lifted on one side and poured into the ship's hold on the other. Thirty thousand bushels are thus poured into the vessel's hold, so that she can arrive and depart between the rising and setting of a single day's sun.

At an expense of a few millions of money, the Mississippi steamer can be enabled to lie against these elevators, or at the piers of a huge lumber yard, and after unloading upon the lake ships the produce of the far West or the extreme South. She can steam to Upper Missouri laden with lumber or ready-made houses, or to New Orleans with grain and pork, and the minerals of the Superior, to be poured into an ocean-bound argosy. A vast trade would thus, Mr. Chairman, be divorced from the more costly railroad transportation. Corporations would be brought to assume the semblance of having souls, though they possessed none.

Sir, we often hear it said that traffic has left the smooth water-way to take the iron one. When prices of commodities rule high, then high rates of transportation can be paid. The high prices pay both producer and carrier. Under the effect of the abnormal prices maintained during and after the late war, not only were the producers and the carriers prosperous, but a vast army of middlemen sprang into existence. The great question with all was rapid transit. To-day war and war rumors cause all the products of the West to bear remunerative prices. But war may not come, and in no event can it be long maintained; war is a costly luxury to kings. In these days of iron forts on the sea, Krupp-guns and vast armies, the deadly conflict on Europe's little theater will soon be over. Our city thoroughfares are crowded with well-dressed middlemen incapacitated by habit for manual labor, to whom the future is dark and dismal. Their occupation died when prices fell. When the electric flash from Europe shall tell us that peace is fixed, then will railroads suffer and farmers will be forced to do as they have done in the past: burn corn for fuel.

Bills are introduced into this House to do violence to the Constitution by legislating upon the tariff of prices to be charged by railroads. Gentlemen forget that the Congress which make rules for the great corporations now grasping the diadem in this Republic—corporations which can never die, and which can ever reach the ear of the legislator—can also unmake rules, and that our most stringent laws have to be interpreted by courts, which are often but the creatures of these corporations. If we wish earnestly to control these deathless and soulless privileged beings, we should enable the people to keep them in check by giving them sure and enduring competing modes of reaching markets. These are water-ways.

The Erie Canal early last year reduced its tolls from one and a half cents to one cent on a bushel of wheat. The grain shipped east in 1877 was less than in 1876, yet that reduction of one-half cent per bushel added to the freightage of the canal about eighteen million bushels. The railroads fought this reduction. They will always fight water lines. In England the great railway corporations have bought up all the canals of the kingdom. Not being able to compete with them they have bought them, and now control all prices.

Sir, the great West and the great East have a common interest in this thing. The West has the grain to sell; the East wishes it for bread. The eastern railroad man will fight either a steamboat-canal connection with Lake Erie to the Hudson or the one from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi. Yet both will benefit the great masses of eastern consumers. A deepened Erie canal will carry to them cheap food; a deepened canal in the West will force railroads to lower their tariffs.

Sir, what will be the effect on the railroads themselves by these water-competing lines? Not to cripple them, but to force them to an economical management. Railroads fail, not because railroads cannot be made to pay a fair dividend upon honest cost, but because their profits are eaten up by their high-salaried and ambitious officials. Their presidents and directors own stocks in "fast-freight lines," in "star lines," in "Pullman palace-car" lines, to whom they make rates ruinous to the stockholders of the road, but paying enormous dividends to the owners of these side-shows. Force railroads to enter into competition with water highways, and these side-shows will die out and corporations will stop voting their presidents salaries worthy of princes. The system of dead-heading legislators will be ended. Congressmen and Secretaries of Departments will cease to ride in directors' cars, but all will pay, and stockholders will cease to have their shares watered out of existence.

Mr. Chairman, in Saxony, where every inch of soil gives of its wealth, railroads run along the Elbe. Yet the Government has walled in that shallow stream, making it keep a single channel; an endless chain stretches along its center; steamers, with machinery of but little more power than a donkey-engine, roll this chain over a drum and stem the swift current dragging trains of heavy barges almost half a mile long. Everywhere in Germany streams which by nature are unfitted for navigation are being turned into navigable waters. And yet throughout all Germany the railroads are virtually owned by the Government; if not owned absolutely, an interest more or less great is in the Government. Government thus, in the interest of the people, keeps down its own railroad dividends. Tariffs of prices are thus kept down to a minimum.

Mr. Chairman, this is a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people. Shall Congress do less for the people than does Kaiser Wilhelm or the King of Saxony, who rule by the grace of God?

Sir, a nation's wealth consists not in the gold and silver coins or ingots which lie in its treasury vaults. Cresus proudly exhibited his golden hoards to the Greek, but the freeman's brain was not dazed by the gilded spectacle; for he knew the Lydian masses were poor and Lydia was only waiting for a conqueror. A nation's wealth consists of its brawny muscles, its working brains, its public buildings, its roads, its navigable rivers and canals, its grassy pastures browsed upon by sleek and fatted flocks, its fields waving with corn, its barns and granaries plethoric with food, its well-filled warehouses, its noisy workshops, its comfortable homes.

The business of its rulers is to enable the people to gain all of this wealth. Sir, a statesman, once when asked how a people should be made happy, answered "roads!" How to be rich, he answered, "roads!" How to be independent and prepared for war, his answer was still "roads!" "roads!" John C. Calhoun said, "Let us bind the republic together; let us conquer space by a perfect system of roads and canals."

Canals and well-filled rivers are but watery roads, roads which neither swallow us in mire nor suffocate with dust. The project which I now favor is within a single State. It is true I am deeply interested in it because that State is my own. But it will connect a nation of States. The navigable waters which this canal will throw into communication wash the soils of over twenty States. It has been favored by statesmen of every locality. Sixty-four years ago the great expounder of the Constitution, James Madison, recommended it; Silas Wright and Horatio Seymour have written and spoken in its favor; Benton and Clay and a host of lesser statesmen did the same. Fifteen years since a convention in its favor met at Chicago, convened on a call signed by ninety-eight Senators and members of Congress. A committee appointed by that convention memorialized Congress in favor of the near completion of this work. On that committee appeared the names of New England DAWES, Edwards and MORRILL, and McDougall from far-off California. Sectionalism was forgotten; the far East united with the extreme West in its favor.

Sir, since Benton and Wright spoke in favor of marrying the great Father of Waters to one of the pure sisterhood of lakes the stride of western improvement has been beyond any parallel in history. The commerce of the lakes is greater than was the whole American commerce on the seas a half century ago. The tonnage of the clearances from Chicago alone amounts to nearly 3,500,000 tons—a million more than it had been in 1867. The shipments by the lake, of corn was over 38,500,000 bushels; of wheat, over 10,000,000; of oats, 5,000,000; of grass and flaxseed, 48,000,000 pounds; of oil-cake, 6,000,000; of lard, 21,500,000 pounds. Besides these there are other classes of produce which run into the millions.

Her receipts of lumber I will give because of their almost fabulous amounts. Over 1,000,000,000 feet of boards, 464,880,000 shingles, 48,000,000 of lath, and 126,000,000 of staves and heading; and 805,000 tons coal. I have counted nearly forty ships and steamers at one time in sight making for her harbor.

A ship-canal would bring the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio steamers alongside of these lake craft. The minerals of Lake Superior, the lumber of Canada and Michigan, the hard coal of Pennsylvania, would pass from them directly to the river steamer. Cotton and sugar would be transferred from the steamer to the ship for the lake cities and the east.

Sir, a few years ago Lesseps became famous by dredging out the sands between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea. And to-day two vast empires are threatening a war which will cost untold millions of treasure, and will cause torrents of blood to flow to maintain the neutrality of that highway to the East. Commercially this connection of the lakes and the Mississippi is of more importance to America than the Suez canal is to England.

Mr. Chairman, is the thing practicable?

In 1867 the great War Secretary, Stanton, caused a survey to be carefully made of the line of the Illinois and Michigan Canal and the Illinois River with a view of determining the practicability of the improvement as a war measure. General J. H. Wilson conducted the survey and reported in 1868, showing not only the feasibility of the thing, but its easy and certain working. By careful examination he found that a canal could be made along the present bed from Chicago to Joliet, a distance of thirty-six miles; and that the Illinois and Des Plaines Rivers could be improved by locks and dams to the Mississippi River, so as to give a depth of seven feet in ordinary stages of water, and a depth of six feet in the lowest stages, throughout the entire length of the canal and river from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi.

This low stage of water is of rare occurrence, not having been in the past but once in over thirty years, and then only for a short time. General Wilson's plan was to widen the present canal to one hundred and sixty feet, and to deepen it to seven feet, and to provide canal and rivers with locks of three hundred and fifty feet length, seventy-five feet wide, and seven feet deep. This would enable a gunboat of six feet draught to pass from lake to river at all times, and a Mississippi steamer of one thousand tons to steam along it at fair speed. He showed that the canal could be fed by a natural flow from the Chicago River. Since his report was made, the city of Chicago, for the purpose of carrying off its sewage, has at its own expense deepened a part of the canal and thoroughly demonstrated the truth of Wilson's calculations.

The Chicago River now flows steadily up stream and pours into the canal as through a natural channel. Lake Michigan may be considered a vast fountain. It is said that it empties through the straits at Mackinac more water than is poured into her by all of its tributary rivers and creeks. And it has been calculated that a larger volume of water is lifted from its surface in mist by a summer day's sun, than is poured into it in the same time by all of its creeks and rivers. Its real and exhaustless supply comes from springs in its cool depths. Their sources are in the far-off plains and mountains of the West. The lake's greatest ebb and flow does not exceed four feet, and that is caused by the shifting courses of the winds. Rainy seasons do not lift it and dry seasons do not sensibly lower it.

Mr. Chairman, a canal one hundred and sixty feet wide and seven feet deep could be fed by the lake without causing an appreciable lowering of its surface. A steady flow of pure water would pour through the canal into the Illinois River, keeping it always full, and would add much to the steadiness of the channel of the Mississippi from the mouth of the Illinois to that of the Missouri. This great national interstate undertaking could be completed at the present low prices of labor for from $9,000,000 to $12,000,000.

This sum could be raised by Government at a low rate of interest, and the tolls would go far toward repaying interest and principal. The present canal has collected over $300,000 in tolls in a single year.

Illinois has expended over $6,000,000 in making the canal and in locking and damming the river. Two locks of three hundred and fifty feet in length have been completed. She would surrender all she has put into it and would patriotically give it all up to have the canal made national.

Sir, should not the Government do this thing? And, if done, is not this the time for it? A million of strong men are now idle throughout the land, idle not from choice but from dire necessity. Idleness has been termed "hell's workshop." Governments are for the good of the people; their legislation should have but one end, and that to better the condition of the people. It may not be their duty to furnish work to the idle but it is their duty to enable them to live and to enable the rich to employ the poor. But to-day the rich do not employ the poor. Capital is idle, because capitalists are timid and lack confidence in the outcome of investments.

Government cannot or does not restore confidence. Government is but the agent of aggregated society of aggregations of men. Should not Government do as men would do? Should it not improve its possessions when labor and material are cheap? A prudent man would and should do this. Why, then, should not the aggregation of men which we call Government do the same? When private enterprises are freely undertaken then governmental undertakings inflate the price of labor and material. When private enterprises are not undertaken, then governmental undertakings are not only prudent but may be not only an economic but a social and political necessity.

Sir, I said idleness is hell's workshop. Out of that pestilential laboratory stalk crime and anarchy. Crime and anarchy are destructive of society and ultimately become the destroyer of government itself. The arrest and punishment of a criminal cost large sums of money. The conviction of a murderer costs Government thousands of dollars. Every day's sittings of a court, with its jurors, bailiffs, and other paraphernalia, cost large amounts. The bulk of a people's taxation is for the suppression and punishment of crime. I have heard of the trial of a single offender costing a State over a hundred thousand dollars. How much more beneficent the prevention of crime, and what so humane as the removal of its cause? Several hundred millions of dollars are wrung from the people every year throughout the States to be spent in the protection of the innocent against the depredation of the criminal, and for the punishment of the criminal. Men are to-day reading with alarm of threatened outbreaks of the commune.

A bill was lately introduced into this House to enable the President to enroll seventy-five thousand soldiers to protect us against these outbreaks this coming summer and fall. Sir, why this alarm? Because men are hungry and discontented. We are asked to vote millions to enroll Americans into an Army and to arm them to shoot down Americans, hungry, starving Americans.

Great God! Sir, has this great Republic, the hope of the downtrodden in other lands, come to this? Shall she be compelled to defend herself against herself with arms? Has it in a short hundred years been proven that this free Government is a failure? for surely no one will say it is not a failure if it is forced to exist not by the will of the people, but by force of arms.

For many years Congress has been legislating for the rich. Our taxes come not from the rich, but from all alike. It is what a man eats, drinks, and wears which pay Federal taxes. A poor man eats and drinks as much as the rich, and pays the burden. Federal burdens fall upon men, not upon wealth. Colossal fortunes are growing up of almost fabulous proportions throughout the country—fortunes either in the hands of individuals or of corporations. None of them, or but few of them at least, are producers. Their wealth is only an aggregation into the pockets of the few from the hands of the many. Equality of wealth brings happiness to a people. For years you have been so legislating that rich men have been growing richer and poor men poorer. The latter are now poor to destitution.

In their name I beg you to give them bread. They ask it not in alms. They are not beggars, unless to ask to work is to beg. They ask you to give them leave to win their daily bread by the sweat of their faces. They are not idle because they are unwilling to work, but because they cannot find work.

Gentlemen ask why the people do not go from the cities to the farms. Ay, go to the farms to tramp by day and sleep by the roadside at night—weary days tramping and begging, and wives and children at home starving or living on charity. Sir, men are creatures of habit. It is hard to break up habits. Those who are denizens of cities and workers in shops know not how to work on the farm. Their habits unsuit them to it. They hope to get work from day to day, and night after night finds their hopes but ashes of despair. Despair goes to the bottle for its Lethe. The bottle uncorked lets out its demon, and thousands who with work at moderate wages would be law-abiding citizens become law-breakers.

There is no use in preaching temperance to hungry men; a dime's worth of whisky brings more temporary forgetfulness than a dime's worth of bread. Men in high places drown care in dissipation. No place in America has yet been so high as to be exempt. Give the poor man occupation and you have preached a more practical sermon than Murphy could with his most impassioned exhortations.

Sir, a few great works ordered this session by Congress would do more good than any financial legislation. Its effect would be immediate—and that is what is wanted. Confidence cannot come until employment shall commence. Set a hundred thousand strong arms at work on public undertakings, and five hundred thousand will find private employment as a result.

Do this, and you may cut down your Army, and there will be no great breaches of the peace. Refuse this, and an army will be necessary and the road will be prepared over which the Iron-Man now across the water learning the ways of kings will march to despotism. Already men who think more of immediate security than of their country's liberty are talking of him. Communism sends them to bed dreaming of rifled strong-boxes. Their morning prayer is for Grant; and Grant means a republic in name, but an empire in fact; with wealth instead of blood the source of aristocracy.

Sir, communism was born of Bourbon oppression, of taxes on the poor, but exemption from taxes for the rich. Kings have nursed the commune, and then have had the prudence to feed its members. Unequal taxation in America is fostering the French exotic, and we are asked to stifle it with bayonets and bullets, when the shovel and the pick in the hands of the commune will cause it to die a natural death. Sir, give the people work and you may cut your Army down to a skeleton.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Chairman, at the special session of this Congress, and on the 9th day of November last, while in a five-minute debate upon the Army appropriation bill, I submitted to the House certain remarks, of which the following is a brief extract:

I say to the gentlemen upon the other side that during the recent riots it was conclusively shown by gentlemen who hold political opinions differing from those held on this side of the House that they believed that the only security we had at that time was in the Army, as was shown by the calls for assistance made by the governors of the States upon the President of the United States.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Does my friend propose to maintain a standing army for the purpose of suppressing the rights of laboring-men?

Mr. CALKINS. Not at all.

Mr. LUTTRELL. It looks very much that way.

Mr. CALKINS. By no means.

* * * * * * *

Mr. CALKINS. I hope my friend from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] does not claim that the riots and destruction of property which took place in the cities of the North were by the workingmen. I hope he does not in any way pass such a libel upon them.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Then they must have been republican politicians, because it took place in republican States.

Mr. CALKINS. I say that those who destroyed property were not laboring-men in the true meaning of the term.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Do you mean to say that the thirty thousand or forty thousand men engaged in those riots were not laboring-men?

Mr CALKINS. I do not know whether they are republicans or not. But this I do know, that the executive officers of States that were democratic called as lustily for the strong arm of the Government as does the gentleman from California to suppress the "heathen Chinee." [Laughter.]

Mr. LUTTRELL. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he believes the maintaining of a standing army is necessary for the purpose of putting down these men who have seen fit to strike against the oppressions of monopolies?

Mr. CALKINS. I say to the gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] that every man has the right to cease work when he chooses, but he has no right forcibly to compel another man to cease work who may wish to.

My surprise may well be imagined when I saw these remarks, not quoted literally as they occurred, but the deductions of certain newspapers drawn therefrom to suit their own purposes, published throughout the United States, in which publications it was claimed that I had taken ground for a standing army for the purpose of suppressing workingmen and certain strikes which came about through associations formed by the laboring-men of the country. Nothing was further from my mind at the time, and it is surprising to me that any papers have drawn any such deductions from the remarks made on that occasion.

I am not one of those who regard labor as servile, but I believe it to be ennobling. It is the workingmen of this country on whom we must depend in any and all emergencies, and there is no one whose sympathies go out to them stronger than mine, and I only make these remarks now in justice to myself because of the adverse criticisms made by certain newspapers throughout the country. My idea then was and is now that we ought to have a standing Army to suppress insurrections of all kinds where they threaten the public peace. But in no way do I believe that an Army should be kept as a menace to prevent that which is lawful. I said then and I say now that it is the right of all workingmen to enter into what is known as strikes and to make them successful whenever it can be done by peaceable and lawful means. I not only believe it to be their right, but when they are oppressed by corporations or in any other way it becomes their bounden duty to see to it that their rights are protected by all lawful means, and no one will stand by them to the last sooner than I.

Now I deny that it was the laboring-men who did the burning and the rioting in the memorable riots of last summer. I hold that it was a class who never dignified labor or who never hardened their hands with honest toil. This class, which infests the lower places of cities, seeks occasions of public commotion to burn and destroy and pilfer; and in many instances—nay, nearly all, during those troublous times—the laboring-men who were engaged in lawful strikes protected the property both of citizens and of railroads against these marauders and criminals.

One instance of the protection which they afforded to property occurred in my own State, at the city of Fort Wayne, and I am credibly informed that they volunteered and did protect the property of the citizens and of the railroad companies by standing between that and an unlawful combination of tramps who had assembled probably for no good purpose. And I here and now repel and hurl back the insinuation that I made an attack upon the workingmen of this country by advocating a larger standing Army than we now have to suppress them as unworthy of the source from which it came. This much I have said in justice to myself. I now proceed to discuss for a short time the bill under consideration, namely, the appropriation bill for the Army, appended to which is an entire change of all the laws on the subject of military organization and the organization of our Army.

I protest again, Mr. Chairman, against the encroachment by the Appropriation Committee upon the rights, privileges, and duties of other committees of this House. I do this in no spirit of unkindness toward that committee. Its members—all of them—I have the highest regard for, many of whom not only occupy prominent places in this House, but in my judgment for years to come will occupy prominent places in the country. They are all gentlemen of probity and great ability and they discharge their duties when they confine themselves to the legitimate business before the committee in a manner creditable to themselves and the body to which they belong. But, Mr. Chairman, what I complain of is that they, either with or without the consent of other committees of this House charged with certain specific and specified duties, absorb all of the powers and duties belonging to these other committees and append them to and put them upon appropriation bills, in my judgment, in direct violation of the spirit if not the letter of the rules of this House.

Now, I know it is claimed that the power was extended to this committee in the spirit, and for the purpose of economy, and I know that there are eminent gentlemen here who advocate the recent change of the rule granting this power to the committee with great earnestness. I have no disposition to criticise the motive of any gentlemen; but that I honestly differ from them in this, ought also be accorded to me; and I am not alone by any means, for it has become a common expression among many of the members of this House that if any legislation whatever is sought the Appropriation Committee had best be consulted, and get them to put it upon an appropriation bill as the only sure means by which any legislation can take place in this House.

This ought not to be so. It is unfair to the very eminent gentlemen who compose that committee. It constantly lays them open to attack. It often imperils the appropriations which ought to be, in my judgment, disencumbered with that species of legislation. It does more than that: it places an absolutism in the hands of that committee, which, when considered for a moment, makes them a power which ought not to exist in a body of this kind. It is unfair to the other committees of the House. It is unfair to the country, and above and beyond all it endangers often necessary appropriations; if it has not endangered them in the past it certainly will in the future. We all know how parties dislike to refuse to support their committees, and under the party lash and party whip legislation may often, and doubtless will often, take place by this method, which, if it had been considered by the committees to which it properly belonged, would never pass the House. I trust the time is not far distant when the House will take from the Committee on Appropriations the power it has given, and give back to the committees charged with those duties the power which has existed in them and belonged exclusively to them for the last eighty years.

I propose now to discuss the changes made in the organization of the Army by this bill. My friend from New York, [General McCOOK,] who has preceded me in this debate, has digested the bill in such a masterly and able manner, that I will not take up the time of the House in going over the same ground. But there are a few points to which I desire to direct the attention of the House and the country, and if I can succeed in doing so in a pointed and succinct manner, so that my views may be fairly presented, I shall consider my task as having been accomplished.

The first point that I desire to direct attention to is this: that the Government of the United States is in honor bound to fulfill all of its contracts. I therefore plant myself upon the broad proposition that when the Government of the United States through Congress passed laws inviting citizens to become Army officers by complying with certain terms and conditions, and when those terms and conditions were complied with by its citizens, their tenure of office should run through life, and not be disturbed except for cause; that that was a contract between the Government and the officer. To be more explicit, when the Government said in any form, either by enactment or by authorizing the President of the United States to appoint officers, that when officers were thus appointed and gave up all their ambitions in life, and bound themselves to this service, their positions should be life positions; and when, upon that promise certain of her citizens did give up all their ambitions in life and did fulfill the requirements which were made necessary, and did accept appointments thus offered, it was a contract between the Government and the person that during his good behavior and in absence of any violations of the law his position should be a life position, and the Government is in duty bound to fulfill the contract thus entered into.

The Government did more than that: it provided for promotions. It held out inducements to the young men of the country that, if they would enter the Army in the lowest positions, they might hope by good conduct, by bravery, and by a faithful discharge of duty to be promoted in rank; and having held out this inducement and having made those promises, the Government is in duty bound to fulfill them.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that it is ordinarily a thankless task to become the champion of men who are disfranchised from becoming an active integral in the management of the political force of the Government. I know that any such task must either spring from motives of gratuity or a desire to be just; and I say to-day that I have no personal interest in the Army nor any of its officers. It is true I served with many of the gallant officers who are now a part of the regular Army during the recent war. I learned to admire many of them for their sterling qualities, for their brave and chivalrous conduct, for their intrepidity and the knowledge which they displayed in marshaling and handling large armies under trying circumstances, but I have not the honor to have a close personal acquaintance with a single regular Army officer, and my remarks are founded solely and entirely upon a desire to do justice to these men.

It was asserted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] in his recent speech that the Army was top-heavy; that the proportion of officers to the enlisted men was out of all proportion, and that legislation ought to be had that would look to the reduction of the number of officers now in the service for that reason. Before I pass to the discussion of this question properly, I will here read a tabulated statement furnished me by the Adjutant-General's Office which is believed to be correct and which is as follows:

Statement showing ratio of apportionment between commissioned officers and enlisted men in 1850, 1853, 1855, 1860, and 1878.

Officers.	1850.	1853.	1855.	1860.	1878.
General and staff officers	299	329	319	348	502
Line officers	585	635	752	735	1,509
Total commissioned officers	884	964	1,071	1,083	2,161
Enlisted men	9,431	9,284	11,658	11,848	25,009
Proportion of commissioned officers to men	1 to 10$\frac{821}{884}$	1 to 9$\frac{75}{171}$	1 to 10$\frac{658}{1071}$	1 to 10$\frac{1018}{1083}$	1 to 11$\frac{1748}{2161}$
Proportion of line officers to men	1 to 16$\frac{74}{585}$	1 to 14$\frac{284}{635}$	1 to 15$\frac{418}{752}$	1 to 16$\frac{73}{735}$	1 to 15$\frac{934}{1509}$

MEMORANDA.—The number of military posts (not including arsenals) was: in the year 1860, 77; in the year 1877, 163.

By this statement it is shown that the proportion of officers to men or private soldiers is not as great now as it was in the year 1850. In that year the Army consisted of 9,431 enlisted men and 884 commissioned officers, or one officer to every sixteen and a fraction men. In the year 1860 the Army consisted of 11,848 enlisted men and 1,083 commissioned officers, or one officer to every sixteen and a fraction men. In the year 1878 the army consisted, in round numbers, of 25,000 enlisted men and 2,161 commissioned officers, or one officer to every fifteen and a fraction men. These officers to whom I have alluded were line officers; but taking the total number of officers, including the line and staff, and the proportion is in favor of the year 1878, as in that year the Army consisted of one officer to every eleven and about a half men, and in the year 1860 it consisted of one officer to about every ten and a fraction men. So it will be seen that the proportion has been pretty well kept up and guarded during those years.

To make this statement clear and that there may be no mistake I read the following, which is believed to be a carefully compiled statement, derived from official sources, and in the main correct:

It was stated in a Washington paper of January 22, 1878, that there are too many officers in the Army, &c. The facts may be seen here. On the 1st of January, 1855, the Army contained two regiments of dragoons, one regiment of mounted riflemen, four regiments of artillery, eight regiments of infantry; total enlisted men, 9,385; total commissioned officers, 948; or one officer to nine and nine-tenths men. On the 3d of March, 1855, the Army was increased by a democratic administration (Franklin Pierce, President,) and a democratic Congress by the addition of two regiments of cavalry and two regiments of infantry. No material change was made after this until January 1, 1861, when the total enlisted was 11,907 and the total commissioned 1,117, or one officer to ten and ten sixty-fifths men.

It will be seen that if the Army is "top-heavy" now it was just as "top-heavy" during the good old days of democracy, and I believe that one may search in vain to find a single democrat between the year 1850 and 1860 raise an objection to the Army on account of the undue proportion of officers. The times have changed since then. At that time at the head of our Army were many distinguished gentlemen who are no longer upon the Army rolls. They believed it their duty to espouse the cause of the recent so-called southern confederacy, and left the Army and joined their fortunes to that cause. Then, as now, the majority of the democratic party was furnished from the Southern States, and I am glad to say for them that they never allowed unjust aspersions and criticisms to be tolerated against the very gallant men who were then in the Army of the United States. And from their stand-point I can well imagine why they should defend such eminent men as the Lees, the Johnsons, the Beauregards, the Braggs, the Hardees, and many others whose names were then upon the Army Register. Nor do I now in any way insinuate that it is the South that is making war upon the present Army organization. Indeed they may well say "We leave that task to you of the North, simply voting with our party whenever you of the North shall have completed your plans."

I will not pursue this branch of the subject further at this point, but proceed to call attention to the necessities of a standing Army and the number which I believe the Army ought to contain.

I took the position early in the special session that the Army ought to consist of fifty thousand men. I have seen nothing which has shaken my belief or changed my opinion since, and I predicate this judgment first upon the judgment of men schooled in army matters. I learned early in life this rule of evidence; that if you wanted to ascertain the truth of any given proposition you should apply to persons who were schooled in the particular branch in order to ascertain the exact truth. For example, if I wanted to study the philosophy of the age I would consult philosophers; if I wanted to learn the law I would consult the eminent jurists; if I wanted to learn farming I would consult practical farmers and so in every department in life. And I know no other rule to apply to the Army than that rule which I learned in the law books many years ago, namely, if you want to know what is required you must consult those who have made it a study for life; examine carefully and critically their reasons and upon that found your conclusions. And the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] who so fairly discussed this question the other day, at the outset was frank enough to say that he was no military man and knew nothing of military matters except as he derived it from the statement of those eminent gentlemen whom he quoted.

While I am not willing to make as frank an admission as the gentleman from New York, still I do not claim to know much of military affairs. What little I learned and know was gained in "awful war;" in the practical part of organizations, in movements upon the field, and beneath the fire of shot and shell; and all I claim now, is to invoke protection—complete protection, bountiful protection—to these grand and gallant soldiers who led the armies in which I bore a humble part. For that purpose I have consulted high authority, and I now quote from a paper published in Harper's Monthly for October, 1877, the authorship of which is traced to a democratic gentleman of some little prominence in this country, General George B. McClellan:

If it be true that it is the duty of every government to prepare in time of peace the means adequate to defend its territory and its people, the statesmanlike method of proceeding is clear enough. Weighing the probabilities of the future in the light of the experience of the past, with due regard to the changes produced by time, the proper strength of the Army should be determined; and once fixed, it should not be changed without good and sufficient cause. Then it should be so organized, posted, and administered as to insure the greatest possible efficiency in the performance of its duties and in its instruction, while economy is insisted upon to the greatest extent consistent with that efficiency.

If an Army is necessary at all, it should, like any other necessary thing, be made in every respect efficient; and there is no true economy, but, on the contrary, real extravagance, in the policy of practicing ill-judged parsimony, either by reducing the Army below the requisite force or crippling its instruction and usefulness, to save a few dollars. We do not believe that the Army is unpopular in this country; we believe that the great mass of our people desire an Army of proper strength and of the highest possible efficiency, and that when they understand the real state of the case they will have no sympathy with those who seek to gain cheap popularity for themselves by destroying the usefulness of the Army, and endangering the best interests of the country in order to save a few millions to-day by a course which will entail the future expenditure of as many hundreds of millions. Considering the immense length of our frontier, the great area of the Indian country, our past experience, and the probabilities of external complications we think that, far from reducing the present strength of our Army, it should, on the contrary, be increased to somewhat more than forty thousand men; and we are confident that it is possible to effect this at a moderate increase of cost beyond that of the present establishment.

The alpine climber is safer without a staff than with one too weak to bear his weight; for, if he has none, he will avoid dangerous points, and go only where his unaided strength and activity will sustain him, while if the treacherous staff breaks in the moment of need, he is lost beyond redemption. So a government too poor or too penurious to support an adequate army and keep it in high condition will do better to dispense with one altogether, and submit as gracefully as it may to the humiliation and disaster it is quite sure to encounter.

General Hunt, another officer of our Army and a man whose democracy cannot be questioned, who belongs to the old school of democrats, and believes that a large standing army is a menace and a threat which a republican government ought not to allow, says as follows:

In 1854 I tried to get my life insured. Among those to which I applied was the branch in New York of the London Life Assurance Company. It refused to take the battle risk on any terms. I said their London office advertised battle risks on officers going to the Crimea. "Oh, yes; that is for British officers," was the reply. "Why not, then, for American officers?" "Because, while we keep up a force proportioned to the work required you do not. There is no country in Europe that would require the service your Army renders from less than five times the force, and you therefore lose in time of profound peace—that is, while your President says in his messages you are at peace with all the world—a larger proportion of officers killed than we lose in peace and war together. I mean," he added, "if you take from the losses of your Army those of the wars of 1812, of Mexico, of Florida, and Black Hawk—recognized and appropriated for as wars—and consider those of the peaceful intervening periods, the percentage of killed in your Army would be greater to your whole force than has been that of the British army in the whole period, and in that time we have been at war in Europe, with you, and somewhere else always. (1804–1854.) Every few weeks the newspapers report a skirmish or a scout in which an officer is killed. It is soon forgotten. We have kept records, with the results named, and we are ordered from London, under no circumstances, to insure American officers against battle risks." I left the office a wiser man than I entered it, and I have verified as far as practicable the statement. According to the Army Registers the deaths of regimental officers of the active list from 1867 to 1877 were two hundred and ninety-one, of whom forty-one were killed, being one in seven. Now here is a pretty showing. Eleven years' work shows that the average of deaths by battle among regimental officers is 1 in 7 in times of such profound peace that Congress has been cutting down the Army all that time, and proposes further reduction, even to ten thousand men, for a country of forty-five million people and three million five hundred thousand square miles; that the average of death by battle is one-sixth of that by disease, i. e., of every 7 officers who die in our regiments in time of peace 1 dies on the field or of wounds. And in this calculation are not included those who are so badly wounded or disabled in campaigns as to be retired before they die of their injuries. With double the force this loss would only rate as 1 in 14—in fact, as 1 in 28, for the absolute loss is double what it would be if the Army was of adequate strength, and so prevented half these conflicts at least.

There is good ground in all this for a charge against any nation professing to be Christian, that, for the pretense of saving a few miserable dollars, so much life should be sacrificed unnecessarily. I say for the pretense, for it can be easily shown that no saving is effected. On the contrary, it costs more money to sacrifice these men than it would to save them. Then what does it further imply? That a small number of men are driven about from pillar to post to do the work and take the risks that should be shared among three times their number. Give us a fair open war, and we have nothing to say against it; but as to killing us off at this rate in a time of profound peace, and at the same time accusing us of "idleness and uselessness," because it is peace, is a little too strong.

Added to the authority of these two eminent soldiers, men who certainly have no sort of sympathy with the republican party, is the testimony of General Hancock, and the eminent gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCOOK] has carefully collated in his speech the evidence of Generals Sherman, Schofield, Pope, Howard, Towsend, Marcy, Ingalls; Colonels McKenzie, Merritt, Gregg, Wood, Wilcox, De Trobriand, Smith, Carlin, Dodge, Hatch, Jones, Flint, Hazen, Gibbon, and King, all to the same effect. None of these eminent gentlemen believe that in a country like ours it is safe to trust to an army of less than fifty thousand men. Some of them put it higher; others a trifle lower; and yet in the face of all this testimony of men skilled in their profession, having spent a lifetime studying it, in the face of all this, our democratic friends declare that the Army should be reduced, some of them as low as ten thousand, others fifteen thousand, and by this bill to twenty thousand.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, after they have received the testimony of all men that are competent to speak on this subject, they wilfully and deliberately throw it aside and declare themselves to be better judges of what the military strength of this country ought to be than those who have made it a life study, and in this manner and by this means propose to reduce the number of our men in the Army to twenty thousand. Is further comment necessary?

Not long since I called upon the eminent and worthy Secretary of War and requested of him a statement of the number of arsenals which we have in the country, and about the value of the property in those arsenals, and I append hereto the letter which was written to me by the chief ordnance officer in response to my inquiry:

ORDNANCE OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 5, 1878.

SIR: In accordance with a memorandum of the Secretary of War, I have the honor to inform you that the value of the public property at the tweny ordnance establishments amounts to over $45,000,000.

These ordnance establishments are located as follows, viz: Allegheny arsenal, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; Augusta arsenal, Augusta, Georgia; Benicia arsenal, Benicia, California; Fort Monroe arsenal, Old Point Comfort, Virginia; Fort Union arsenal, Fort Union, New Mexico; Frankford arsenal, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; Indianapolis arsenal, Indianapolis, Indiana; Kennebec arsenal, Augusta, Maine; New York arsenal, Governor's Island, New York Harbor; Pikesville arsenal, Pikesville, Maryland; Rock Island arsenal, Rock Island, Illinois; Saint Louis powder depot, Jefferson Barracks, Missouri; San Antonio arsenal, San Antonio, Texas; National armory, Springfield, Massachusetts; Vancouver arsenal, Vancouver, Washington Territory; Washington arsenal, Washington, District of Columbia; Watervilet arsenal, West Troy, New York; Watertown arsenal, Watertown, Massachusetts; United States Military Academy, West Point, New York; ordnance proving ground, Sandy Hook, New Jersey.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. V. BENÉT,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Ordnance.

Hon. W. H. CALKINS,
House of Representatives.

It will be seen that in addition to the one hundred and sixty-three military posts which we now have and which it is necessary to garrison there is added twenty arsenals, making a total of one hundred and eighty-three points where it is necessary to keep up and maintain a military force. These arsenals alone contain forty-five millions of Government property. It was said by the eminent gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] that some fifty of these posts were useless and might be dispensed with, but being interrogated by the gentleman from Ohio, the gentleman from New York admitted that these fifty posts that were useless and might be dispensed with ought only give way to other posts which were absolutely necessary, and I think it should not still be contended that the Government can get along with less than one hundred and sixty-three posts which are now established or which are actually required. Then, if you reduce the Army to twenty thousand men, including the twenty arsenals and the one hundred and sixty-three posts which are required, it would give but a fraction over one hundred men to each post and arsenal.

Now, let us consider that a moment. Many of these posts on the frontier are hundreds of miles apart, many of them are almost inaccessible during the winter months, many of them are cut off or practically so from all assistance early in the winter until late in the spring; cut off from all communication with settlements except an occasional hardy pioneer or ranchman; exposed not only to the danger which the necessary amount of travel exposes them to, but also to attacks by the Indians, without any assistance which can be sent to their relief. This is the condition which it would inevitably leave them in.

I hold it to be the duty of every government to protect all of its citizens so far as it can, at least to afford ample opportunities and to leave nothing undone which ought to be done for their protection, and yet this reduction of twenty thousand men leaves the hardy pioneer and frontiersman at the absolute mercy of the hostile savage.

Not long ago I had occasion to read the report of a most bloody and terrible butchery which occurred in the great highway between the Black Hills and the Missouri River. Its ferocity chills the blood. The scene is narrated by a scout who was an unwilling witness of, and who stood paralyzed and saw the most terrible butchery of recent years, but powerless to render aid. It was that of two men and a woman who, driving along in their wagon, as they had a right to do upon the territory of the Government, were attacked by these savages, some twenty or thirty in number, and the wily savages first expended their amunition in killing the two men, but carefully preserving the life of the woman that their hellish purposes might be realized. The scene of that contest makes the blood run cold in every Christian man's veins. Four hours after these gallant men had been killed and this woman worse than killed, another caravan passed and witnessed the disemboweled and mutilated carcasses of the men and the worse condition of the woman as these hellish savages had left them.

Mr. Chairman, the only return the citizen gets from his Government for the onerous taxes which he pays, and for the response which he makes to his country's call in time of war, is the protection to his person and to his property, and whenever any government assumes to protect its citizens and refuses or neglects to do so, that moment that government is a sham, a delusion, and a snare. I would have an army large enough to protect the hardy pioneer and frontiersman. I would have an army large enough that, when these savages attack the western settlements, the military forces, like an avenging Nemesis, will pursue them until they are brought to such summary justice that they will learn at least that the American citizens are protected in their own country and that the country is not only willing to but will do its duty.

Take our border along the Canadian line, stretching out as it does for thousands of miles, and then turn your eyes for a moment to that gallant little band under Custer who charged into the savage camp but a year ago and there met a horrible death; and after Sitting Bull and his tribe had been allowed to murder Custer and his men—yes, worse than murder, for after they were slain their dead bodies were mutilated in the most horrible manner—and after all this Sitting Bull took refuge across the border in Canada, only again to make his incursions on the white settlements whenever his savage ferocity may lead him on. In the presence of these lawless bands of savages the American people by the Congress of the United States lifts up its voice and says reduce the Army!

Take another case; who has forgotten the gallant charge made by Gibbon and his few men into the camp of the Nez Percés lately, in which he killed as many Indians as he had men, and his own command suffered most terribly at the hands of the savages—all for the lack of enough men to visit summary punishment upon them. Yet the cry goes out reduce the Army!

Take the hundreds and thousands of our settlements in the Territories, where night after night they have stood guard over all that was near and dear to them to protect them from the tomahawk and scalping-knife. Take the many murders, cold-blooded and inexcusable, that have taken place and are still taking place, in which the solitary settler is attacked at midnight and killed, and his cabin lights up the wilderness by the torch of the savage. All of these atrocities cry out in thunder-tones for redress; and yet we sit here trembling in the face of the country, and, on the false cry of economy, still go on reducing the protection which we ought to afford to these persons. Shame, shame on such measures as this!

Again, Mr. Chairman, take the Texan border, and I know there are gentlemen here who represent it that can describe it much better than I; but my picture would be incomplete without an allusion to it. While the courts are in session in the State of Texas and justice being administered, we as a nation see before our very eyes the robbers come from a sister republic across our border, rob our people of their property; drive off with impunity their stock; kill and murder our citizens; break up our courts of justice; set at defiance all law, and set at defiance a Government of forty-five millions of people. This not once or twice, but recurring daily. And still we sit here and tremblingly cry out "economy," and for that purpose reduce the Army.

How long shall these things be endured? How long must we submit tamely and quietly and spaniel-like to these outrages? How long will the people allow us, or some of us, for the purpose of making cheap capital on the false basis of economy to suffer these wrongs and let them go unrequited and unpunished? I mistake the temper of the people whom I represent if they will not in thunder-tones condemn such reprehensible acts. For these reasons, if for no other, I am still of the opinion that an army of fifty thousand men is not too great; and, in the words of McClellan, "whatever is worth having at all, is worth being kept well and efficient."

Another aspect of this case, Mr. Chairman, is this: it is claimed by eminent gentlemen of the House that all internal commotions, riots, and insurrections within the respective States ought to be suppressed by the militia of those States. I fully agree with the gentlemen that each State ought to keep and maintain a militia system. But, Mr. Chairman, they do not. The Western States do not keep and maintain a militia force. It is only in the larger cities of the country where this force can be kept; in the very nature of things it cannot be kept up in the country. Take our people in the West. They are an active and busy people; an industrious people. They accumulate their fortunes by the small. A year's labor of an honest and industrious husbandman produces but a small surplus at best. It would be a very severe tax upon him to require him to give his time so as to become a trained soldier even in the militia. In cities, where there is a number of rich men who delight in display and can afford to pay the tremendous and onerous expense, it is different; but in the country there is absolutely no time to be devoted to these purposes. Fifty years of experience has demonstrated it. In my own State I do not believe there is a regiment of trained militia, all told, which could be relied upon in any emergency.

Besides the direct tax which persons of the different States would be required to pay to keep it up, a militia system would be onerous and burdensome, and I may say, Mr. Chairman, that the militia system throughout the West is a failure—a great failure.

Now, it is admitted on all hands that there ought to be some reserved power or force to repress or suppress these insurrections when they take place or which are likely to take place, and which may pass beyond the control of a sheriff's posse comitatus. It is necessary to arm and equip such force. But no one will contend that an interior country can arm and equip a little army upon the spur of the moment. What better depository for all these equipments than the arsenals of the Government of the United States? They are made especially for that purpose.

I believe with eminent gentlemen upon this floor that the military forces of the United States should be the dernier ressort. Every other force, every other power should be exhausted before calling upon them. But I believe further that whenever the governor of any State who is the magistrate and the executive, charged with the execution of the laws of that particular State, sees danger imminent and believes it to be for the best interest of all that the military should interfere, he should have the power to call upon the President for such military force as is necessary to preserve peace and protect life and property, and this military force should be exclusively within and under the control of the governor of the State. And he should make it subservient to the local officers where the difficulty exists so that no usurpation or abuse could be practiced by the military, except by the direct order of the person legally charged with the peace of society. By this means all usurpation, all menace which the military would produce, would be dispensed with and we would not be open to the charge of keeping military forces for the purpose of overawing our citizens, because they would be commanded exclusively by the local officers.

Now, I am unable to agree with the eminent gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] in his logic that it is better to suppress an insurrection by militia than by the regular Army. I should be inclined to judge of the result rather than the means made use of to effect it. And while the gentleman is an eminent logician and a very wise and practical statesman, I must disagree with his logic, that it is better for a militiaman to kill another in a domestic insurrection to preserve the peace and good order than it would be for a regular soldier to kill him. In my judgment, it makes little difference who commits the act, whenever the act becomes necessary, so that life and property and good order are protected and preserved.

So much, Mr. Chairman, for the militia system; a word now as to the expense. I maintain that an Army of forty thousand men would cost a very trifling sum more than an Army of twenty-five thousand men. In the first place, the two thousand and odd officers which we have would be sufficient to officer them so that there would be no or very little increase, if any, in expense. Second, we would save millions of dollars in the transportation of both troops and supplies. The large part of the expense of our little Army now is the cost of transportation; whereas, if there were bodies of troops stationed at different points in sufficient numbers that it would not require rapid transit of troops to re-enforce certain points when war breaks out between Indian tribes on the frontier, all this transportation would be saved. This would largely reduce the expenditure for transportation.

There are many other ways in which and by which very large sums of money would be saved by means of increasing the rank and file of the Army and not increasing the officers. In my judgment an increase of three or four millions of dollars a year would maintain a standing Army of forty thousand men, and it would save very much more in property to our citizens than the expenditure and in life, both of the soldiers and of the frontiersman, and of the men upon our border. Who can tell how many lives it would save? We cannot measure human life by dollars and cents, and if it saved but one it would still be an economical expenditure.

And again, Mr. Chairman, one growing cause of complaint against the Army has been its use in the States recently in rebellion against the Government. But, Mr. Chairman, in every instance where the Army has been required to perform delicate duties in those States in nearly every instance it has met the commendation of the very persons against whom it was used.

I remember the substance of the words uttered by the speaker of the house of representatives in Louisiana to General De Trobriand when he was called upon to dissolve or to partially dissolve that body; and in the performance of that delicate duty he received nothing but commendations from those against whom he was directed. Recently, in the terrible disorders which occurred in South Carolina, General M. C. BUTLER especially commended the Army in the performance of its duty. I notice in the testimony of Captain Kellogg, taken before the Senate committee charged with the investigation of the affairs at that time, the following evidence is given by him:

> I may say that after the election was over, just after the polls closed, General M. C. BUTLER came around and requested permission from me to make a speech to my company; I told him I had no objection, although I had; yet I could not very well say so; so I said I had no objection, provided he would not say anything about politics; and he said certainly, that he wished simply to thank us; and I then called the company to attention, and he made us a little speech in which he thanked us for the courtesy and the impartial manner in which we had performed our duty during the day.

In all instances, so far as I have been able to learn, wherever any duty was performed by the Army, its officers or men, they did it as gentlemen, with due regard and respect for the citizens against whom they were directed.

But I need not go further into that, because the day has passed and we have passed the third scene after our war. All are now clothed with complete citizenship and the States with local self-government. Nobody hailed the day with greater delight than I, and I truly hope that in those impoverished States where war has desolated many homes and reduced to poverty and desolation very many villages and cities that the time has forever passed when such scenes shall recur again in this land of ours.

And now I want to make an appeal to my friends from the South. While there is a radical difference in political sentiments between many of you and myself, yet there is one great fundamental doctrine upon which we may agree: that is, the glory and the honor of our common country. While I fought as hard and as long as any one to subdue the rebellion, which I believed to be a crime against my country, and which I still believe was a crime, yet I never have seen the time since the war closed that, if one of the brave men who fought against me was hungry, I would not have divided my last ration with him; that, if he was naked, I would not have given my coat; if tired, I would not have shared my blanket with him. Adopting the language of Roderick Dhu, I would have said to either of you, "Come, share a soldier's bed, a soldier's fare." But while I have thus felt, I have also felt that there are many things that have divided us and that still divide us. But upon the great question, that of national unity, national greatness, national prosperity, we are one.

I beseech you, then, brave and chivalrous as you are, having met you and felt your power on many a field, not to do an act of injustice to the Army who have no political following, no political influence. Men who have left their homes, left all ambitions in life, who can look forward to nothing in old age except the smallest pittance and the little stipend that is given out by Congress to protect them and feed them in their declining age, without expectation of pleasant homes and firesides, with nothing to look forward to except the laurels they have won upon the battle-field and the fame they have helped to build up for the Government—with nothing but this to cheer them, I beg you to do justice to the grand Army. And in this extremity, when the Government has provided for those who have been faithful to it, I beseech of you not to strike a blow at them. They are helpless here except by your generosity to them. I know I shall not appeal in vain.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the few members of the committee who still remain here to the unfairness of the arrangement made in regard to the debate upon this bill.

This morning the debate upon this bill was limited to this evening's session at twelve o'clock, or at least at the end of this night's session. But gentlemen will remember that the time of those who have spoken has been extended and in some instances doubled and again in other cases the time was extended an additional half-hour, and the result is that by the courtesy of the House at least one-half of those who wish to give their views to the House and to represent the interests of their constituents are entirely ruled out.

It looks to me like a very limited courtesy. I would like to appeal to gentlemen to assist me in the morning in having such change made as to give me, say, half an hour or an hour before debate is closed on the bill. I did not object to the extension of any gentleman's time before the debate was closed, and I would not have done so; but I think that gentlemen will see that the rule adopted will not act fairly. I do not know whether, after saying thus much, I should proceed to-night. I would greatly prefer to have a little time to-morrow.

Mr. EDEN. If the gentleman will give way I will make a motion that the committee do now rise, and then I will move that he have, by unanimous consent, leave to address the committee to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I will yield for that purpose?

Mr. EDEN. Then I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration, according to order, the bill (H. R. No. 4867) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. EDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] be allowed half an hour to-morrow morning when the House again resumes in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the consideration of the Army bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution for closing debate upon this bill with this evening's session was agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Upon that question, if the motion be pressed, I shall have to raise the question of a quorum.

Mr. ALDRICH. The resolution closing debate was acted upon without a quorum.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If the House concludes, when there is a quorum present, to extend the time already allowed for debate, I shall be willing to accede to it; not otherwise.

Mr. ALDRICH. If that question is to be raised I shall move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] is pending and he may call it up in the morning or at any time when he pleases.

Mr. BANNING. I move that the House do now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, by unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to the following:

To Mr. AIKEN, for four days, on account of important business;

To Mr. CLAFLIN, for five days, on account of important business; and

To Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, for four days.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BELL, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of W. B. Whitmore, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McCOOK. I desire to know in what position this matter stands now in reference to closing debate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to reconsider the vote by which debate was closed is pending, and can be called up at any time.

The question was taken upon Mr. BANNING's motion, and it was agreed to; and accordingly (at eleven o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 22, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of John Brown, guardian of the children of John Nelson, deceased, who was a soldier in the late war, praying the passage of an act granting them a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MERRIMON. I present five petitions, signed by more than 300 of the leading citizens of Fayette, North Carolina, of all trades and businesses, representing that in their opinion the tax of 10 per cent. levied on the circulating notes issued by banks chartered by the different States is unjust and against the best interests of the people, and they pray Congress to repeal as much of the internal-revenue law as imposes this tax. I believe I can say that the public sentiment of North Carolina is unanimous on that subject. I move the reference of these petitions to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I present the petition of Benjamin S. Brooks, Egbert Judson, John Carter, and David S. Turner, of California, in which they state that they are the owners of an island called Yerba Buena, somewhat known in the discussions of Congress, and they trace the right to the same back to 1849, as they claim. They pray that this right be recognized by Congress by appropriate legislation. As the island is a military reservation, I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MATTHEWS presented the memorial of Allison, Smith & Johnson, and others, manufacturers of and dealers in type, of Cincinnati, Ohio, remonstrating against the refunding to Miller & Richards of a fine imposed upon them for undervaluing goods passed through the custom-house at San Francisco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4874) for the relief of the sureties of John McNellis, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4420) for the relief of Horace E. Mullan, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1918) for the relief of Milton B. Cushing, paymaster United States Navy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 230) to authorize and enable the Eastern band of the Cherokee Indians to institute and prosecute a suit in the Court of Claims against the Cherokee Nation, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HEREFORD. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 235) for the relief of Joseph Kinney, administrator of David Ballentine, of Missouri, to report it favorably, adopting the report previously submitted by the committee. There is a minority report also, which will be presented by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. HOAR. I desire in behalf of four members of the committee to present the views of the minority; which I ask to have printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made.

Mr. GROVER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 885) to amend the act approved September 27, 1850, creating the office of surveyor-general of Oregon, providing for the survey and making donations to settlers of the public lands in Oregon, and also the act amendatory thereof, approved February 14, A. D. 1853, reported it without amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 1132) for the relief of Lieutenant-Commander James H. Sands, United States Navy, reported it with amendments.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 613) subjecting the Fort Wayne military reservation, in the State of Arkansas, to entry as other public lands in said State, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

DRURY BYNUM.

Mr. OGLESBY. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1201) for the relief of Drury Bynum, to report it without amendment and to submit a written report thereon. I will state that the amount involved is only $35, being a fractional part of a quarter's payment due him in 1861 in some land office in Mississippi. The Commissioner of the General Land Office sent the account to be examined, and it was found that that balance was due Mr. Bynum. All that is needed is an appropriation to allow the money to be paid. It will be a troublesome matter to take up again, and it is better for the Senate to dispose of it now than at any other time. I therefore ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Drury Bynum, late register of the United States land office at Paulding, Mississippi, the sum of $35.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAMLIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1291) granting a pension to Archibald Nelson and John Nelson, minor children of John Nelson, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1292) for the relief of Elias D. Bruner; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1293) granting a pension to Sallie A. Palmer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1294) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Wabash River; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. BECK and Mr. WITHERS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-routes in the several States therein named; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

AMENDMENT TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. GROVER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4236) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SETTLERS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the Senate take up the bill (H. R. No. 3373) for the relief of settlers on the public lands under the pre-emption laws, which I reported yesterday from the Committee on Public Lands. It is a mere matter of form, and a similar bill has passed the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs that any person who has made a settlement on the public lands under the pre-emption laws, and has subsequent to such settlement changed his filing in pursuance of law to that for a homestead entry upon the same tract of land, shall be entitled to have the time required to perfect his title under the homestead laws computed from the date of his original settlement heretofore made, or hereafter to be made, under the pre-emption laws, subject to all the provisions of the law relating to homesteads.

Mr. BECK. What is the meaning of "changed his filing in pursuance of law?"

Mr. PADDOCK. The change of his filing made under the pre-emption law to that for a homestead. The object of the bill is to give pre-emptors who have spent a year or two or three years upon their lands in improving them the benefit of that time when they shall make the change described in the bill as they may do now under the law as it stands but with the loss of their time theretofore spent upon the land. I will state to the Senator that although this is a House bill the Senate some time ago passed exactly the same bill and sent it to the House; but instead of the House taking up the Senate bill and passing it they passed the House bill, every word of which is the same, and sent it to us.

Mr. BECK. I did not catch the word exactly and did not understand its meaning. I understand it now.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN HENDERSON.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 796) for the relief of John Henderson. I think it will take but a moment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to refund and pay to John Henderson $5,000, in full satisfaction of the amount paid by Henderson upon a bond for the release of one hundred barrels of spirits given by him as claimant, under the order of the United States district court for the eastern district of Missouri, and upon which spirits he in good faith had paid the taxes assessed by the United States officers.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think the bill ought to have an explanation.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say that this bill was considered by the Committee on Finance of the Senate and unanimously agreed to. Mr. Henderson was a citizen of New Orleans, and a dealer in liquors. He purchased in bond from a Government warehouse one hundred barrels of whisky, paying the owner of it the excess over the tax of about a thousand dollars. This was done in the ordinary course of business. He shipped these high wines to Saint Louis and sold them there in open market. Afterward, the Government of the United States seized the hundred barrels of whisky upon the idea that the original intent of the distiller was to defraud the revenue. Mr. Henderson filed his bond, and secured the release of the whisky. The case was tried in the district court and Henderson recovered. It was appealed to the circuit court and Henderson recovered, and then it was appealed by the Government of the United States to the Supreme Court of the United States, and a majority of that court decided against Henderson under a section of the statute which states, as interpreted by a majority of the court, that if the distiller had the original intent to defraud the Government that intent must follow the high wines through until they were purchased in open market. A minority of the court, however, held that Mr. Henderson, having purchased these liquors in good faith, was entitled to recover the amount of his bond. The committee were unanimously of the opinion that Mr. Henderson ought to have refunded to him the amount paid on the bond, and therefore they reported the bill favorably.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The bill is then to reverse the decision of a majority of the Supreme Court?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; it has no such purpose. Upon a technical construction of the statute the Government of the United States has taken out of Mr. Henderson a tax on those distilled spirits. The innocent purchaser paid only the value of the spirits. The Government has recovered the amount of the bond originally given by Mr. Henderson when he recovered the spirits from the Government under a writ of replevin.

Mr. BAYARD. There has been no defalcation.

Mr. ALLISON. No defalcation in any respect was made either by the distiller or by Mr. Henderson. Henderson purchased the spirits from a Government bonded warehouse and paid the tax, over $3,000 I believe, or about $3,000, for the spirits, and paid the distiller the value of the spirits over and above the tax, amounting to $1,000 more. In other words he paid over $4,000; $3,000 of which went into the Treasury, and under a technical construction of the statute by a majority of the Supreme Court he has had a judgment rendered against him of $5,000 on his bond. We say that is inequitable and unjust, and therefore the Government cannot afford to hold this money.

Mr. WITHERS. It is to relieve him from the payment of that judgment.

Mr. ALLISON. He has paid the judgment, and it is to refund the amount paid to the Government as tax.

Mr. WITHERS. I understand.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TREASURY DISCREPANCIES COMMITTEE.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senate to take up the resolution I offered a few days ago in regard to the Treasury discrepancies committee, and providing for the continuance of the committee during the recess of Congress, and I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to the matter.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, on the 17th instant:

Resolved, That the select committee to investigate the finance reports, books, and accounts of the Treasury Department, appointed under resolution of the Senate of November 19, 1877, in addition to the powers conferred by said resolution, have leave to continue its investigation and sit during the vacation or recess of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not propose to make any objection to the proposition made by the Senator from West Virginia, although I think the statement that he made the other day was rather gratuitous in anticipating the report of the committee and saying that there was no doubt about the facts that he had stated being as stated by him. I thought that was rather anticipating the verdict. I must say in addition to this, having ascertained from the Senator's own admission that he does not propose to superintend or take care of this investigation during the recess, that this appears to be nothing more than a proposition to allow the clerks to have a per diem during the recess. I trust to the prudence of the Senator from West Virginia, knowing his notions of economy, that he will see to it that they do not cavort about and run the Government largely into debt during the recess.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, as to the gratuitous part of anticipating the report of the committee, I had not intended to say one word on that branch until the resolution was objected to; but I will say to the Senator from Vermont that there was no gratuitous information given. I stated as a Senator, not upon the authority of the committee, as the committee had not been consulted, that each and every statement that I had made in my previous remarks in the Senate would I believe be found substantially true, including the assertion that the debt statements had been changed to the extent of over $200,000,000. I repeat that now. I believe that every word I said, and more too, will be proven. But that statement is made upon my own responsibility. I have no authority from the committee to make it.

As to the examination to be made during the recess, it is known to the Senate that the committee has two clerks engaged at a per diem of $6. That is all the expense that will be and all that has been incurred. There has been no testimony taken up to the present time, and probably none will be taken during this session. The committee as a whole I believe thought it best that the clerks during the recess of Congress should look carefully into the books of the Register, the Secretary, and the Treasurer, and make comparisons. I believe that the work will be done by the two clerks properly. Eight or nine hours every day will be employed by those two clerks in examining and comparing the books. What the result will be, of course I know nothing about; but in justice to myself, having made repeated statements in the Senate that discrepancies did appear, that changes had occurred, and that those changes involved very large amounts, I wanted the Senator from Vermont and the Senate and the country to know that we are not asking to continue the committee in order to examine into what I had stated in the Senate, for that already has been examined into, but that it is other and new things into which we propose to examine. I say to the Senate that I believe the committee have worked diligently. They have called upon the Secretary of the Treasury and other Secretaries for information which has not yet been furnished. It is impossible for the committee to make a report until the information asked for by the committee from the heads of Departments is furnished. I believe the heads of Departments have done what they could properly to furnish the committee with information. There has been nothing kept from them that ought to have been furnished.

Mr. ALLISON. The object of this resolution, as I understand it, is specifically as stated by the Senator from West Virginia, namely, to enable the two clerks of the committee to continue their investigations in the Treasury Department. I think there is no other object proposed. I do not understand that the committee propose to take testimony or to continue specially their investigations. The object is only that these two experts, as they are called, may continue during the recess their examinations of these voluminous books, extending through a long time, and prepare tables and matters of comparison for the committee when the recess shall have ended. But that there may be no mistake about it, I suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that he add to the resolution the words "so far as to continue the examination of the books in the Treasury now in progress." That is the exact purpose the committee have in view, and I think it had better be expressed upon the face of the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I listened with pleasure to my colleague on the committee [Mr. ALLISON] and I agree with him except in this, that his suggested amendment may restrict us to books now being examined. I think it would be better to let the resolution merely give the committee leave to continue its examination, and the committee will have power to determine what kind of investigation it shall be. The Senator himself will have power to direct the examination by suggesting to the chairman what to do, if he thinks proper. The object of the committee is that these clerks may continue their work during the recess. That is all. But if we incorporate in the resolution the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, it may restrict us to some particular books, which the Senator does not intend, I know.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to add, "so far as to continue the examination of the books in the Treasury now in progress." That is the examination of the Treasury books being now in progress, it may be continued during the vacation. That is the object, and I think it is wise to state it on the face of the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not like to differ with my colleague on the committee, but I think the resolution now will cover it.

Mr. ALLISON. I move the amendment which I have suggested, so as to take the sense of the Senate upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. It is probable that the interval between the adjournment of Congress and the commencement of the next session will be brief, and the members of the select committee will undoubtedly be considerably occupied. A number of the committee live at quite a distance from the capital, and it would be very inconvenient to have this resolution adopted in such a shape that meetings of the committee might be called which some of the members could not attend. I understand the only object which the Senator from West Virginia has in view is to have the formal examination of the books now in progress continued by the clerks or experts who have that branch of the examination in charge. That being the case, it is proper that the resolution offered by the Senator from West Virginia should be restricted by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

While I am upon the floor, I will say that I regretted extremely to hear the statement made by the Senator from West Virginia when this resolution was before the Senate on a previous day, and which he has repeated again this morning. He alluded to the fact that he spoke for himself and not by order of the committee. That is true. But my understanding of the proceedings of that committee up to this instant has been that under no circumstances were any declarations to be made or any statements to be offered to the public while the investigation was in progress, the apprehension being very natural that as the examination was but partial, statements might be made which would injuriously affect the credit of the country, and I will venture to observe that myself having examined the records so far as they have been made by these experts now having the case in charge, I differ entirely from the Senator from West Virginia in regard to the statement that he has made. I do not believe that the examination when concluded will show that there has been any dereliction of duty or any corrupt appliance or any improper use of the public funds by any officer of this Government, but that on the contrary discrepancies, if they exist, will be found to be entirely innocent and explicable upon theories consistent with the honesty of the public officials and due simply to the different methods of book-keeping that have been adopted by different administrations having the finances of the country in charge.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, before I speak to the change proposed to the resolution I will say a word in reply to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. INGALLS.] It is true, as he stated, that there was an understanding in the committee that no statements made and no information gathered by the committee should be made public. I think that has been adhered to, at least so far as I know, though there have been many applications of course by correspondents for information. I believe the committee has adhered to its rule. I regret that my colleague on the committee differs with me in that—I ought to say that the statements I had heretofore made I believed would be found true. That was the extent to which I went. I said nothing about what any result of the committee's examination had been. I spoke as a Senator, and not on the part of the committee, and I thought I was not going beyond the proper understanding of the committee when I made that statement. If I had thought so I should not have used the language I did. But the statement has been made, and I think it is true. I believe as firmly as that I am here that every statement I have made heretofore about discrepancies in the Treasury Department and the changes and alterations is true. Now as to the misapplication of money and as to what officer did this and as to how it was done, as the Senator has spoken of that, I have expressed no opinion. I do not expect to express any. That does not change the statement I have heretofore made that the changes and alterations, especially in the debt statement, had increased the public debt over $200,000,000. That is a fact. The statements show for themselves. I am not stating it for the committee; I state it as an individual, and I have stated it heretofore in the Senate two or three times, and I now repeat it. I believe it to be so, and I think the investigation will show it. I am sorry, though, that I have in any way got beyond, if I have, the understanding of the committee. I had no understanding with the committee that I as an individual in the Senate could not speak of what I believed to be the facts as connected with the investigation. In that respect I spoke not upon the part of the committee, and I do not say now that the committee has passed upon anything at all connected with the investigation.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question before he sits down. He says the debt statement has been increased $200,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Over $200,000,000.

Mr. ALLISON. Over $200,000,000. Does he mean by that to say that the debt has been improperly stated to the extent of $200,000,000 or does he mean to say that somebody has taken $200,000,000 out of the Treasury?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Certainly, Mr. President, the Senator does not mean to infer that I had said that somebody had taken $200,000,000 out of the Treasury. I never have made such a statement and I never expect to make such a statement until the committee make the report, and not then unless it be a fact. I have made no such statement, nor do I intend to make any such statement, nor can any Senator draw me into making such a statement in advance of the fact being investigated by the committee. What I do state is this: take the Register's report, also the Secretary's and Treasurer's reports for 1869, and compare them with the official finance reports to Congress made in 1871, and there will be found an increase of the public indebtedness of more than $200,000,000 upon the face of the statements themselves. Now, the object of the committee is to investigate that change and see why it was made. Does either of the Senators or does any Senator deny that fact? Can any Senator deny that important fact?

Mr. ALLISON. There was a different mode of statement; that was all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. A different mode of statement when the amount is increased, as I have said, over $200,000,000! It is a different mode of statement; but you may take an accountant and let him desire to make a different mode of statement and make an increase or decrease, and he certainly can do it. There is no trouble about that. It does not take away from the fact that the debt statement has been increased over $200,000,000.

Mr. BLAINE. This seems to me a very important statement, and I should like to get what the Senator means.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I mean just what I say.

Mr. BLAINE. There has been ever since the war closed a monthly statement of the public debt every month, and it has shown right along a gradual decrease. At what point was this $200,000,000 increase?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator is mistaken about the monthly debt statement having been made ever since the war. I think it commenced in 1866 or 1867.

Mr. BLAINE. That was very near the war. I did not mean the very day it closed.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I say to the Senator that the monthly debt statements do not agree with the statements contained in the finance reports as sent to Congress. I say further that the Register, the Secretary, and the Treasurer all differ as to the amount of public debt constantly up to 1870, and in 1870 there was a general revision of the public debt and all these statements got comparatively together; and between 1869 and 1871 as stated previous to 1869 there was an increase. For instance, I will take one year, if the Senator desires me to do so; take the year 1862: Secretary Chase, as will be remembered, made the report to Congress in 1862. In round numbers he said the public debt was $514,000,000, and it was so reported by each Secretary and by Secretary Chase himself in after years up to 1869. When you take up the report of 1870 the debt of 1862 is put down at $524,000,000, an increase in round numbers of $10,000,000 in that particular year. Now take, if you choose, the year 1868, and you will find an increase from what it was reported at in 1868, when it is reported in 1870 of about $75,000,000 according to my recollection. In that way, I say, the debt statements have changed, and increases have taken place.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, on the 19th of November, 1877, the President of the Senate appointed Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia, Mr. BECK, Mr. ALLISON, Mr. INGALLS, and Mr. CAMERON of Pennsylvania a committee under a resolution which I will read:

To investigate the finance reports, books, and accounts of the Treasury Department, particularly with reference to differences, discrepancies, and alterations in amounts and figures that have been made in them, if any such there be, especially in the annual statements of the expenditures of the Government, revenue collected, and the public debt contained in said reports; and, if any such differences, discrepancies, and alterations be found to exist, to report the same and the extent and nature thereof, the years wherein they occur, by what authority made, (if any,) the reasons that induced them, and to report generally such other and further information bearing upon the subject as to them may seem best; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to take testimony, to employ a stenographer and two clerks, and with leave to sit during the session of the Senate; and that the expenses attending this investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the committee; and said committee shall not be dissolved by the expiration of the present session of the Senate, but shall exist until it shall make its report or shall be discharged.

That resolution indicated, by the elaborate and careful language and details it contains, not only that the Senate regarded the question as an extremely important one, and one involving a vast amount of labor, one which involved perhaps the correctness of the books of the Treasury Department and the confidence the people of this country and of other countries would have in the statements made by the Treasury officials. I think the resolution gave us power to sit during the recess. It uses this language:

And said committee shall not be dissolved by the expiration of the present session of the Senate, but shall exist until it shall make its report or shall be discharged.

Fearing, however, that we might not have the power to sit under those general words, the committee at a meeting it held ordered the chairman to ask for this additional authority:

That the select committee to investigate the finance reports, books, and accounts of the Treasury Department, appointed under the resolution of the Senate of November 19, 1877, in addition to the powers conferred by said resolution, have leave to continue its investigation and sit during the vacation or recess of the Senate.

I thought we had the power, but the committee desired to have it made perfectly clear, and I am sorry that anything has been said on either side as to what will be the result of our investigations. Our action evidently is extremely important, and we have been making them with great care. I do not know how much attention others have paid to them; I know I have gone to our committee-room at least once a week during the whole winter and have found the chairman of the committee there, I believe, nearly every time I went, with the clerks working faithfully, calling for a report of the Secretary from his books, of the Register from his books, of the Treasurer from his books, comparing them together and with the finance and other reports, to see how the different accounts stood and how they had from time to time been kept or changed; calling on the Secretary of War for the expenditures of his Department, on the Secretary of the Navy for the expenditures in his, on the Secretary of the Interior for the expenditures in his, on the Postmaster-General for his, so as to compare each together and with the reports of the Treasury officials. I avow here that the object I had in view in seeking to extend this examination and sitting during the recess if necessary, calling the committee together if it was thought best and keeping the clerks at work under the general authority, not limiting it as the Senator from Iowa seems to desire—in short I was anxious to do whatever is necessary to ascertain the truth and the whole truth in the matter. I desired, above all other things, not to make a partial report now. It cannot be done and do justice, the proper investigation cannot be had and the examination of witnesses made before this session of Congress adjourns if we attend properly to our other duties; and as there will be a heated canvass all over the country this fall in a majority of the congressional districts, I greatly desire that no imperfect report should be made that would perhaps do injustice to one side or the other during that canvass. I hope that every fact and every opinion that gentlemen on the committee on either side might have should be withheld from the public until the examination was concluded and the result carefully and well announced to the Senate. In order to do it even next winter, I believe these clerks will have to work all summer. I think the committee ought to meet once or twice during the recess, or perhaps we could come here say two weeks before Congress meets, in order to take testimony, in order to be able to get through next winter after the excitement of the November election shall have passed away.

For myself I never have indicated and I will not now indicate any opinion as to the result; and I was anxious to bridge over this examination during any political excitement because it will be better for all parties that the facts should turn out, if they can be shown to do so, that the books of the Treasury have been honestly kept and that the accounts and the money of this people have been properly cared for; and I hope it may turn out that way. Whether it will or not is not for me to say now, because we have not progressed far enough to ascertain whether it will or not; but I do not want any party in these congressional races to assume the fact to be one way or the other. But I did not want, after spending six months of labor here trying to ascertain all the facts, to come in now with an imperfect report or be cut off from continuing the investigation in any way we may desire. I hope we shall not be called upon to meet during the recess. I have a great desire not to come here then, but it may be that it may be important to come a week or two in advance of the regular meeting of Congress, and I should like the authority to remain as I think it remains in the original resolution to do whatever the circumstances may require us to do.

I hope the Senator from Iowa will withdraw his amendment. I understand the Senator from West Virginia will be absent the greater part of the summer. The Senator from Iowa, the Senator from Pennsylvania, the Senator from Kansas, and myself, (and perhaps the Senator from West Virginia may return in time,) may deem it best to come here a week or ten days before the regular session of Congress or take some steps to facilitate and promote the investigation. It is extremely important; it is important to the country; it is important to the officers who have been in these positions; it is important to the world to know just what the facts are. We should not cripple ourselves now by curtailing our power to ascertain the whole truth. If it is deemed best not to do it, the committee need not be called together. I hope for my own personal convenience that there will be no session, but I do think we ought not to be limited in an investigation which all admit to be so important. The amendment may cripple it. The Senator from Iowa may be sure that no step will be taken without full consultation with him and with each member of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It has not been reported yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to add:

So far as to continue the examination of books of the Treasury now in progress.

And strike out "and sit."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Do I understand that it is proposed to strike out the word "sit" in the original resolution? I would much rather have no additional power granted at all, because the amendment goes back and takes from the committee powers given them by the Senate after a week or more debate here on the original resolution. That I never could consent to; and I hope the Senator from Iowa has no wish to restrict the committee in any form or in any manner. I have no objection to say that under the resolution now under consideration the committee itself will not sit during the recess; but I cannot consent willingly—of course it is for the Senate to decide—that we shall only examine the books "now in progress." We are examining some books; that will be through to-day, perhaps, and to-morrow we shall want to take up others.

Mr. ALLISON. I will modify the amendment in that respect.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Now let the amendment be read as modified. But will it not be satisfactory to the Senator to say that the committee shall not sit during the recess? I have no objection to that, and I have not said that it will sit during the recess, or, rather, that any testimony will be taken during the recess.

Mr. ALLISON. That is what I desire to avoid. Of course, if we desire to come here a week or ten days before the next session there will be no objection to doing that; but we shall have an abundance of labor in making examinations of these books in the Treasury as compared by the experts without taking testimony.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Just add that no testimony shall be taken until ten days before the next regular session, if you choose, or say not at all. Either way will suit me.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator that he leave the resolution with my amendment as modified.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let it be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution, as proposed to be modified, will read:

Resolved, That the select committee to investigate the finance reports, books, and accounts of the Treasury Department, appointed under resolution of the Senate of November 19, 1877, in addition to the powers conferred by said resolution, have leave to continue its investigation and sit during the vacation or recess of the Senate so far as to continue the examination of books in the Treasury.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Now, will it not be satisfactory to the Senator to strike out the words "and sit," and let the resolution stand as offered.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Now I understand the resolution is just as offered by myself, with the words "and sit" taken out. Now will the Clerk read it as it stands?

Mr. ALLISON. With the addition I made.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution is proposed to read as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee to investigate the finance reports, books, and accounts of the Treasury Department, appointed under the resolution of the Senate November 19, 1877, in addition to the powers conferred by said resolution, have leave to continue its investigation during the vacation or recess of the Senate, so far as to continue the examination of the books in the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HOAR in the chair.) Is there objection to the resolution as proposed to be modified?

Mr. BECK. I understand that by this proposition all questions relating to expenditures in the War Department, Navy Department, Interior Department, and everywhere else are to be excluded during the whole recess.

Mr. ALLISON. No.

Mr. BECK. That is the meaning of it; that is the effect of the amendment; and if that is the purpose we might as well quit examining, because it is by the details obtained from the various Departments that we compare the Treasury books.

Mr. ALLISON. I will obviate the objection of the Senator from Kentucky by modifying the amendment so far as to continue the examination of the books in the several Departments of the Government. I wish to continue this investigation through these experts, but I do not wish to be called here, because I do not believe there is any necessity for any of us being called here during the recess to take the testimony of witnesses with reference to this matter of book-keeping in the Treasury. Therefore I only desire that these experts, selected by the chairman of our committee, shall continue their examinations everywhere and anywhere so far as to furnish us complete and full information when we return here in December.

Mr. BECK. If we are to be crippled all around in this investigation when it is desirable to pursue the facts, I hope the whole resolution will be laid on the table and that the chairman of the committee will call us together and keep us on it from now until Congress adjourns, so as to be able to make a report next month. We can do it by working all the time, and then the country will see just what it is. But if we are to be crippled, if we are to be confined down here and there to clerks merely making inquiries at such points as the Departments may see fit to give us, we had better have no authority at all, but let us press on and bring our labors to a conclusion and make a report. We can make one. It may not be very satisfactory, but it will be a report, and the country will like to see it. I move to lay the whole thing on the table.

Mr. FERRY. Has not the morning hour expired?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HOAR.) The morning hour has expired.

Mr. FERRY. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 4663.

Mr. INGALLS. I call for the regular order.

JOINT RULES.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish to report from the Committee on Rules a series of joint rules which the committee instructed me to report to be proposed to the House of Representatives. I merely move for the present that they be printed and laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FERRY, (Mr. HOAR in the chair.) The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] has called for the regular order. I think the understanding yesterday was that at one o'clock to-day, on the expiration of the morning hour, the Senate would proceed to consider House bill No. 4663, pending which——

Mr. INGALLS. What is the title of that bill?

Mr. FERRY. A bill to forbid the further retirement of United States legal-tender notes.

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir.

Mr. FERRY. The bill was to be called up and temporarily laid aside for the purpose of calling up what is known as the Texas Pacific Railroad bill, to allow the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] to express his views upon that bill. That was the understanding yesterday.

Mr. INGALLS. The understanding of the Senator from Michigan is very different from mine.

Mr. FERRY. I leave it to Senators who were here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HOAR in the chair.) The Chair understands that the unfinished business is the bill (H. R. No. 3259) providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGALLS. That is correct.

Mr. FERRY. I think there are many Senators present who will bear me out that the understanding was what I have stated, no objection was made, and the Senator from Ohio on my right [Mr. MATTHEWS] said "If that be the understanding, then I withdraw any objection," or something to that effect.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Michigan states the understanding correctly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of an agreement by Senators by unanimous consent, the Chair must take the Journal as governing the order of business, and the Chair is informed by the Chief Clerk that the unfinished business is what he has announced.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] himself gave as a reason for moving an adjournment last night, first, that he desired until this morning to examine this bill, and he asked the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] if he would not allow it to go over until the morning, with the understanding that it was the unfinished business, as of course it must necessarily be from the position it occupied. He also stated that he and some other Senators had some engagement which required an adjournment at an early hour yesterday. I understood, however, that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] after the expiration of the morning hour was to speak upon the Texas Pacific Railroad bill, the business that should be unfinished to be laid aside temporarily for that purpose.

Mr. INGALLS. That was the agreement.

Mr. SARGENT. That was the agreement.

Mr. FERRY. In answer to the Senator from California, I will restate what occurred. Yesterday I reported from the Committee on Finance the bill which I hold in my hand and gave notice that to-day after the morning hour I would call it up and ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration. Occupying the chair when the morning hour expired yesterday, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] called up the regular order, which was the finance bill reported by the committee on a prior day. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] then rose and called attention to the fact that some days since he had given notice that yesterday he would ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the Texas Pacific bill, and stated that his object was to give an opportunity to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] to express his views upon that bill. The Senator from Michigan left the chair and urged the Senator from Indiana to withdraw his motion to proceed to the consideration of the regular order, for the purpose of extending the common courtesy which has never been refused to any Senator when he stated that he desired to express his views simply upon a pending measure. I then asked him and through him asked the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] who was entitled to the floor upon the bill which I hold in my hand, if he would not also give way to the Senator from Mississippi who had been announced as ready to speak to-day on the Texas Pacific bill. The Senator from Delaware very courteously yielded to the Senator from Mississippi; and then there being no objection the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] rose and said: "If that be the understanding, that is satisfactory," or words of that import. I think there was no misunderstanding. This was in the morning at the close of the morning hour. What occurred at the latter part of the day I have nothing to say about.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I was surprised yesterday at the point of time to which the Senator from Michigan has now alluded, that neither he nor any other Senator took any steps to establish any definite understanding in this regard, and I have looked over the RECORD to see if I could be mistaken in this, because I had a reason for observing and remembering it. The Senator from Michigan said in the conclusion of the brief statement which he made:

> Now it seems to me that there can be no objection to taking up the bill that was reported this morning from the Committee on Finance, and when it is before the Senate I will then move to lay aside that bill inasmuch as the Senator from Delaware is willing to yield the floor, as he is entitled to it, for the purpose of listening to the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi. When those remarks are concluded, I shall then ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the finance bill, when the Senator from Delaware will have the floor.

That is all a statement of what the Senator himself proposed to do. It was a notice he gave to the Senate. But one thing ensued which looked like an understanding or the presumption of an understanding at all, and that was a remark which fell from the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MATTHEWS,] and that remark does not bear out at all, I think, the understanding which the Senator from Michigan now has. I will read it, and it followed the remark that I have read from the Senator from Michigan:

Mr. MATTHEWS. Then, Mr. President, with the understanding that I now understand has taken effect that the Senator from Mississippi will be entitled to the floor at the expiration of the morning business to-morrow, laying aside temporarily and informally any pending business, I have nothing further to say.

I do not wish to occupy a moment in referring to these facts; but having had a special reason for observing, as I thought, the failure to come to any such understanding about the finance bill as the Senator from Michigan suggests, I ventured to call the attention of the Senate to some of the things which appear upon the RECORD, and I will read one or two other observations made by Senators, that the Senate may see what was the nature of this suggestion; and I say that it was a mere suggestion of the Senator from Michigan of what he proposed to do. It never was propounded from the Chair at all and never received the consent of the Senate; and I think I can be quite sure it would not have received unanimous consent if it had been propounded. The Senator from Michigan first said:

I desire to state in this connection that to-morrow I shall seek the floor to invite the Senate to consider this bill. I understand that one member of the committee, the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] desires to express his views upon the bill, and I shall endeavor to ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration to-morrow.

That was the first suggestion about it. Later on, at the part of the RECORD which I read before, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] made an observation which is quite significant of his understanding. He said:

Now the Senator from Michigan reports another bill from the Committee on Finance this morning which in many respects covers the same points as the bill formerly under consideration, and gives notice that the bill will be taken up to-morrow. So I can see no difficulty in the way if the Senator from Mississippi only desires to submit his remarks to-morrow, and then let the regular order proceed, whatever it may be.

"Whatever it may be." That was at a time when the Senator from Ohio was insisting that it should be one bill, and the Senator from Michigan was expressing the hope and determination as far as in him lay that it should be another bill, and after he had made his final announcement the subject was dropped, when the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] said that the Senator from Mississippi would be able to proceed, the pending business, whatever it might be, being laid aside, and there leave was taken of the whole matter, no proposition for general consent ever having been propounded to the Senate, and there having been no time when any Senator might, if he chose, or could be, informed what the proposition was, inasmuch as one Senator insisted that it should be one bill and another Senator insisted that it should be another.

At the conclusion of the session yesterday, when an executive session was ordered, after an adjournment had been suggested by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] it was certainly understood that the District bill was to proceed as the unfinished business to-day. That, I think, is an understanding which the RECORD will bear me out in saying obtained in the Senate. I beg to read a word from the conclusion of the day's proceedings. These are the words of my friend on my right, [Mr. HAMLIN:]

That will leave this bill as the unfinished business for to-morrow.

The District bill."

Mr. INGALLS. To be taken up at the expiration of the morning hour?
Mr. HAMLIN. It comes up, of course.
Mr. WHITE. I want just here to ask the Senator from Maine to allow me one moment.
Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Then the Senator from Maryland referred to an authority or two; and then the Senator from Maine made his motion for an executive session, and an executive session occurred, and the Senate adjourned. Now, I have no doubt myself that the unfinished business is the District bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. Allow me to call the attention of the Senator from New York and the Senator from Michigan to the conclusion of this matter as it stood when the arrangement was finally consummated. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] said this:

Then, Mr. President, with the understanding that I now understand has taken effect, that the Senator from Mississippi will be entitled to the floor at the expiration of the morning business to-morrow, laying aside temporarily and informally any pending business, I have nothing further to say.

There was an announcement of the understanding. How far that is binding on the Senate is not for me to say; but that that was the understanding at the time I think there can be no doubt.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Indiana did not hear me read all that remark. Had he done so, he would have noticed an accent somewhat different from that which he gave to it. He reads it in a way which shows that the part interesting to him is the preceding part. I read it with an endeavor to show that the interesting part to me, as bearing upon the point at issue, is this "laying aside temporarily and informally any pending business." It seems to me that is significant of anything rather than an understanding that one particular bill and no other was to be the pending business, particularly when the remark came from a Senator who was insisting all the time that a bill which he had in charge, other than the bill represented by the Senator from Michigan should have primacy at that time. I read it, as my friend from Indiana will see, to show that the Senate did intend, and of course intends now—I hope nobody will suppose that I as one Senator am standing in the way—to offer the Senator from Mississippi the courtesy, the occasion, the convenience that he preferred, but did not intend to pledge the Senate in advance, that at the conclusion of his remarks one bill rather than another should be considered the unfinished business.

Mr. FERRY. The closing remark that appears upon the RECORD in connection with this matter was from the lips of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MATTHEWS,] and the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] in reading the RECORD does not discover that any single objection was made to that concluding expression of his views of the understanding of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He could not make an understanding by stating his view of it.

Mr. FERRY. My honorable friend says we could not get an understanding of the Senate by his view of it.

Mr. CONKLING. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him and ask him, as he is an authority on this question, he presides so much in the Senate, whether it is not true, and is not the universal acceptance of the Senate, that to make an understanding binding, as far as one is binding, it is at some time to be stated from the Chair and objections inquired for? I ask whether I, for example, am able to estop and bind the whole Senate by getting up in my place and saying "I understand the Senate will do so and so," and, unless somebody files a caveat against it, the Senate is bound in honor to do it?

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator from New York insists on the technical practice of the Senate, he may or may not be right. The Senator from Michigan could not occupy two places. He left the chair for the purpose of attempting to reconcile the antagonistic motions that were being made in order to reach the point of allowing the Senator from Mississippi, as notice had been given of his desire, to express his views upon a certain bill to-day.

The Senator from Michigan stated precisely what he would move, and that was the report which he holds in his hand—a bill reported from the Committee on Finance—and that upon that the Senator from Delaware was entitled to the floor. The Senator from Michigan stated that he would call that up before the Senate, and that when it should be before the Senate he would move to lay it temporarily aside for the purpose of yielding an opportunity to the Senator from Mississippi to make his speech.

Mr. INGALLS. Was it the only object of the Senator from Michigan in making that motion to allow the Senator from Mississippi to make his speech?

Mr. FERRY. I am coming to that. If the Senator will allow me, I am coming to that.

Mr. INGALLS. If that was the desire of the Senator, I stated expressly that when the District bill was again taken up, if it was not concluded yesterday, I would yield this morning for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Mississippi to speak.

Mr. BAILEY. I rise to a question of order. I believe, Mr. President, that all the Senators agree that it was understood yesterday that the Senator from Mississippi should have the floor this morning. All admit that whatever might be the pending business it should be laid aside informally so that he might address the Senate in regard to the Texas Pacific Railroad. I submit to Senators and to the Chair that this question can be settled after the Senator from Mississippi has addressed the Senate. I raise the point of order that the Senator from Mississippi shall first be heard, and then this disputed question shall be settled afterward.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state his ruling upon the question of order. The ninth rule of the Senate peremptorily imposes a duty upon the Chair:

Immediately upon the expiration of the morning hour, the presiding officer shall lay before the Senate the unfinished business at its last adjournment, which shall take precedence of the special orders, and shall be proceeded with until disposed of by the Senate.

Accordingly it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the bill providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia. These orders which have been alluded to or understandings, whether they were or were not entered into, unless entered upon the Journal and made in a form which suspends the standing rule of the Senate for that purpose, can only be operative as binding upon the sense of individual Senators not to object to anything which is asked for. But the business in order is the bill providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is now before the Senate.

Mr. FERRY. Now, I move to postpone the present and all prior orders for the purpose of considering House bill No. 4663, and I do it simply to be in order in stating what I intended to state, and to call the Chair's attention to the fact that a matter of order having been raised by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY,] I was taken off the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator moves to postpone the present and all other orders for the purpose of taking up the bill which he has named.

Mr. INGALLS. That motion is not in order, Mr. President.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He can make a motion to postpone alone.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the question of order is raised, the Chair rules that the motion must be confined to a postponement of the pending business.

Mr. SARGENT. I rise to a point of order. There was an agreement in the Senate yesterday which is not denied by any Senator, as I understand. Not any Senator denies that, whatever business might be pending at the close of the morning hour to-day, the Senator from Mississippi should have the floor to make his remarks. I raise the point of order that that understanding of the Senate must be executed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought to be executed; but the Chair cannot execute it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand that such an arrangement, not entered upon the Journal, is an arrangement which it is within his power to enforce.

Mr. SARGENT. It is entered in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Undoubtedly; but not on the official record of the Senate, its Journal.

Mr. SARGENT. That is a very dangerous ruling, and if the Chair insists on it I shall have to appeal from the decision of the Chair. We cannot hold the pen in the hand of the Clerk so as to know whether he enters on the Journal an understanding of this kind; but where it is debated ten minutes and finally settles down into an agreement, recognized by Senators in all directions as an agreement, if that cannot be enforced unless the formality of entering it upon the legislative Journal is pursued, then we certainly cannot have such agreements with any safety. Therefore, for the sake of the practice of the Senate, I shall have to appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the appeal. The Chair rules that an agreement of Senators, not entered upon the Journal of the Senate, to take effect after the Journal of the proceedings when it is alleged to have been made has been read and approved by the Senate, the Journal containing no record of the agreement, cannot be enforced by the Chair of his own authority. From that ruling the Senator from California appeals.

Mr. SARGENT. For this reason, that a fact known to every Senator does not need record evidence to support it. The fact is undisputed and known to every Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from California that such an agreement cannot be known to Senators who are absent when it is made.

Mr. SARGENT. That makes no difference if a quorum of the Senate is present. It is not an order the Senate makes, but an agreement made by Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the judgment of the Chair stand as the opinion of the Senate?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to say in one minute, in order that the Senator from Mississippi may have a chance to go on, that in my humble opinion the decision of the Chair is clearly correct, and similar decisions have always been upheld during the whole time of my experience in this body. The principle which the Chair has stated is one which I believe the Senate has never departed from. An understanding, assuming that there be one, of the kind stated by the Senator from Michigan, is an understanding that only appeals to the private sense of propriety of each Senator; but the business of the Senate and the duty of its proceedings under the rules is only shown by the Journal of the Senate; and sometimes when it has been proposed that these understandings should be put on the Journal objection has been made on the ground that we would not vary the rules, but Senators must trust to each other to carry out an understanding. Therefore I think that the judgment of the Chair ought to stand.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from California has made a point of order which I think he will perhaps withdraw after I have made a statement.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to state that the Journals do not show any agreement or understanding of this kind ever made in the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Never.

Mr. SARGENT. Such an understanding has never been entered on the Journal; and the Chair rules that unless it is entered on the Journal there can be no agreement or understanding. Now, as there never in any instance has been such an agreement or understanding entered, it cuts us off hereafter from any.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; the Chair has not ruled that.

Mr. SARGENT. I so understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has not ruled what the Senator from California states. The Chair simply rules that after the Journal of proceedings of a preceding day has been made up and approved by the Senate, the Chair cannot of its own authority enforce upon the Senate an alleged agreement found nowhere in the official records of the Senate, upon statements as to its character from Senators.

Mr. SARGENT. Then it simply amounts to this: it rests in the honor of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Always.

Mr. SARGENT. This is a violation of the honor of Senators, and I raise the point of order that it is out of order for Senators to violate their honor as Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One point of order cannot be raised while another is pending.

Mr. FERRY. On the question of the appeal from the decision of the Chair, I desire to state——

Mr. LAMAR. I hope the Senator will allow me a moment.

Mr. FERRY. I am trying to protect the privilege of the Senator from Mississippi, and certainly I will yield to him if he desires to speak in that behalf.

Mr. LAMAR. I just wish to say that, thanking gentlemen for their courtesy, I trust there will be no further discussion upon this subject. I can address the Senate at some other day just as easily. ["No," "no."]

Mr. EDMUNDS. We ought to hear the Senator now, and we can.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I hope the Senator will not postpone his remarks.

Mr. FERRY. I think I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. FERRY. Now I desire to state, as clearly as I can, the position I took yesterday; and that was that this morning, at the close of the morning hour, I should call up House bill No. 4663, and when it was before the Senate——

Mr. SARGENT. I rise to a point of order. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is upon the appeal from the decision of the Chair, on which question of order the Senator from Michigan is on the floor.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator is not speaking to that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is debatable.

Mr. FERRY. It is debatable, and I have the floor.

I said that when the bill should be before the Senate, upon which the Senator from Delaware was entitled to the floor, as the Senator from Delaware had given expression to his disposition to defer his opportunity of speaking upon the bill to some other day for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Mississippi to express his views upon the railroad bill which the Senator from Ohio had in charge, I would move to lay this bill aside for that purpose. The Senator from Ohio then rose and said substantially as read by the Senator from New York, that if that be the understanding he was satisfied. No objection was raised. If the Senator from New York says that it is a necessity for the Chair to put the question to the Senate and ask if there be any objection, then of course that statement not having been made it was not so ordered in the sense of the remarks of the Senator from New York; but as the Senator from Ohio had called the attention of the Senate and said "if that be the understanding then I am content," or words to that effect, and no objection being offered, the Chair, or whoever occupied the chair, understood that that was the general understanding of the Senate. Now, Mr. President, that states the position I took so far as I am concerned, and in my judgment a correct position.

Since I raised this question this morning I understand the Senator from Delaware does not desire to speak to-day, is not prepared to speak to-day, and the Senator from Kansas has intimated that he is willing to yield the floor for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Mississippi to address the Senate upon the bill proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. INGALLS. I agreed to do it yesterday.

Mr. FERRY. That I was not aware of. I heard it from the lips of the Senator this morning. My only object this morning, aside from seeing that this bill is not overridden, my only object yesterday and to-day was to allow the Senator from Mississippi to submit his remarks, he having asked that privilege, and it has always been accorded to any Senator, and I thought it was the courtesy of the Senate to accord it to him.

I now, Mr. President, hope that the Senator from Kansas will carry out the intimation he suggested, his bill being before the Senate, after the appeal has been disposed of.

Mr. INGALLS. I have been trying to do that since one o'clock. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRY. Then the reason why it has not been brought to an issue is because other Senators with myself have occupied the floor in their several rights.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the only reason.

Mr. SARGENT. I withdraw the appeal, and will not longer delay the Senator from Mississippi.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The appeal is withdrawn. Is there unanimous consent that the pending business be laid aside informally and the Senator from Mississippi proceed with his remarks on Senate bill No. 942. ["Certainly."] The Chair hears no objection.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 942) amendatory of and supplementary to the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and the several acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President, I have asked to be heard to-day upon a bill in the success of which I feel a deep and anxious concern, and I rise to address the Senate with a profound sense of the necessity and the importance of its passage.

The object of this bill is to extend the time for building the railroad from the waters of the Mississippi to San Diego on the Pacific coast and to make sure its speedy completion.

The causes which have rendered it impossible for the company to complete this work within the time prescribed in its original charter are well known, and may be stated briefly, but entirely, to have been the disastrous and universal depression of all railroad securities in the money markets of the world, consequent upon the panic of 1873. Notwithstanding these adverse circumstances in such direct contrast with those under which the other two roads were built, (for they were undertaken at a time when the capital of the world flowed in unprecedented sums into railway enterprises and securities,) this corporation has built four hundred and forty-five miles of railroad which is now in successful operation and doing a great work in the development of the country it traverses.

There is therefore nothing in the history of the management of the road itself, and certainly no change in the immense national importance of the work, that calls for a forfeiture of the franchises of the company, or that should lead Congress to deny to it such aid as the interest of the country might otherwise require or the constitutional powers of Congress justify.

I shall avoid taxing the attention of Senators with the details of this measure, and will discuss only those leading features of it which I am anxious to commend to the favorable consideration of the Senate.

The length of the road to be constructed under this legislation is fourteen hundred miles. The whole amount of bonds to be issued by the company, to be used for construction and equipment, is not to exceed $31,750,000. The whole amount of interest to be guaranteed by the United States is less than $2,000,000 per annum. The company is authorized to deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury its own bonds at the rate of $20,000 per mile for the construction and equipment of the line between Fort Worth and San Diego, and for the difficult and mountainous regions not to exceed $35,000 a mile. Those regions are two hundred and fifty miles altogether, I believe. The bill says that for not more than two hundred and fifty miles shall bonds be issued at the rate of $35,000 per mile. I repeat, the whole amount of bonds to be issued (for construction and equipment) cannot exceed, under the provisions of this bill, $31,750,000. They are to run fifty years upon 5 per cent. interest and are payable in coin.

The Government guarantees the payment of interest, but the bonds are not to be delivered to the company nor used by it except as sections of ten miles of road are completed and found to conform to the Government standard, and then only in amount equal to the actual cash cost of construction and equipment.

The bill has been already elaborately discussed both by its friends and opponents before the committee and elsewhere. The friends of this measure advocate its passage as the just and symmetrical completion of the great national system of railway connection between the Pacific and Atlantic already adopted and at present only partly accomplished; a completion which will be, they say, serviceable to the whole country as a measure of economy to the Government in the transfer of its mails, military forces, and supplies; as a measure of military utility for the protection of our frontier; as a measure of political importance in opening the settlement of our western Territories and furnishing a basis for a vast development of population, society, and wealth; and as a commercial measure in bringing American merchants and manufacturers into direct and easy communication with the commerce of the Pacific coast, Mexico, South America, China, and the Pacific Islands, and thus open new and invaluable markets for the surplus products of our manufacturing skill and industry, and also by bringing the vast region which the road traverses, a region teeming with agricultural resources and mineral wealth, into connection with the great Atlantic and Pacific cities and the great inland trade in the West and Northwest.

They maintain that the advantages to the Government and people are ample compensation for the aid of the Government which this legislation provides. They insist that the guarantee of interest is protected by the provisions under which it is given beyond any conceivable contingency, by a mortgage upon the entire road, section by section, as each is completed, its equipments, its franchises, and all its property; by all the earnings of the road; and by the application of all the dues to the company from the Government for the transportation of its mail, its military supplies, and forces, and also by the reconveyance to the Government of its land grant estimated at eighteen million acres of land which are to be thrown open to settlement and sale, and the proceeds of their sale to be applied to the making, if there be a surplus, of a sinking fund for the payment of the bonds.

The opponents of this measure object to it on various grounds. Constitutional doubts are expressed as to the power of Congress to give aid through land or money or credit to these undertakings of internal improvement; the gross and iniquitous abuses of the power conferred by such legislative aid for purposes of corrupt private speculation at the expense of the national interest, and which have greatly shocked the moral sense of the country are cited and urged as reasons why we should never, even with the promise of great advantage to the country, repeat such legislation.

Ingenious arguments are made to show that the securities provided in the bill will not afford any substantial indemnity to the Government for its guarantee of interest. Suggestions are made that the value of the road when constructed, the extent of its business, and consequently its earnings, are matters of prospective speculation, and that their adequacy as security can only be determined in the future; that the amount of Government business of transportation is uncertain and may not assume the same proportion as on the Central Pacific; and, lastly, that the history of Pacific railroad legislation and the practices under it all go to prove that the Government will sooner or later have to make good its guarantee and thus a debt of $100,000,000 will have been placed as a new and heavy burden upon the people for the benefit of a corporation; in a word that it is a huge subsidy to a private corporation of an amount, which, if used as a sinking fund and invested in Government bonds at 5 per cent., would at the maturity of these guaranteed bonds pay $300,000,000 of our national debt. These objections are stated not with a view of controverting them. For the purposes of my argument will not require me to combat the conclusion which they are employed to establish; i. e., that the Government will have to pay the whole of the money which it guarantees without the possibility of repayment. Not that I believe it to be true or even plausible. To believe that, I would have to assume that the entire road, when completed with all its equipments, would be worth nothing, although its cost might be $31,000,000; that it will have no business, no net earnings; that when it is completed the Government will have no mails to be transported through Texas, or through Arizona, or through New Mexico, or through South California; that the Government will withdraw its troops from the Mexican border and from the Indian frontiers; that the whole fruitful and fertile territory between Fort Worth and the Pacific is never to be the seat of population and trade, and that the land grant of eighteen millions of acres said to be so munificent is worthless, and that the lands are not worth the expenses of survey and sale, all this and more, if I accept as true the assumption that this Government will have to pay the sum which it guarantees in this bill. But, absurd as the proposition is, assume it to be true.

Then the question presents itself, Will this Government appropriate $2,000,000 annually for the completion of a railroad connection with the Pacific, the material and moral effect of which upon the prosperity and strength of the whole Union no language can describe? Will the advantages of such a road as a postal road, as a military road, as a political road, and as a commercial road, justify the annual expenditure of $2,000,000? This expenditure, it must be borne in mind, will not be any new outlay or additional expenditure, but simply the diversion of money that is sure to be expended in other less efficient and less economical channels.

Sir, the amount is not one-half of that which you appropriate annually for rivers and harbors without discussion. It is not equal to what this Government expends annually in the maintenance of two cavalry regiments. It is not as much as this Government expended before the war for mail transportation alone to the Pacific coast. And the question recurs, and I press it upon this body, if the completed construction of a railroad to the Pacific Ocean is not worth as much to this Government in the increase of national power, in the development of national wealth, as the transportation of the mail to the same coast was worth to this Government before the war, when we had but thirty million population and when the postal demands of that country were not equal to what they are now in South California, Arizona, New Mexico, Southwestern Texas demands which are unmet by the existing transcontinental communication.

Nor, sir, is it fair to say that this guarantee of interest would be a vast debt of $100,000,000 pressing upon the resources of the people. It is true that the expenditure of the $2,000,000 per annum, if the Government has to pay it, will in fifty years aggregate $100,000,000. But the same is true of all annual appropriations. You might as well claim that building a port to protect the harbor of New York, or that the appropriations for the support of the Army, of the Navy, of the Government itself, constitute a debt. Calculate what these cost per annum and what would it be in fifty years?

My purpose is to show that the road is a great national enterprise; that its results will be to increase the national power, to develop the national interests, and to augment the wealth and prosperity of the people of the whole country, and that in the completion of it there will be an ample compensation to the Government for any aid it may render.

Mr. President, the sudden acquisition of our Pacific empire, through war, was a remarkable epoch in the political history of this country. It was contemplated with very different emotions by the great statesmen of that day. Some regarded the event with enthusiastic and confident feelings; others were dejected and anxious. Mr. Webster viewed it with the greatest apprehension. To him it was a monstrous apparition, and in the Senate of the United States he protested against the policy, in a speech marked by his usual ability, but by unusual earnestness and solemnity. He declared that it was impossible for this vast empire ever to be incorporated into our political system; that it could not constitute a part and parcel of this American Republic without disturbing the equilibrium of its political forces. He said that the entire country was more distant, more isolated from us than even some of the states of Europe; its scenery was Asiatic and its physical character unsuited to modes of life of an American population. He declared that to hold it as a Territory would involve us in expense, in sectional animosities, and foreign embroilments, and to admit them as States would cause to be wrought into our Constitution a disfigurement, a monstrosity, a deformity, one that would impair its principle, and he expressed apprehension that it would break the Union to pieces. Mr. Calhoun, although he acquiesced under the exigency of war in the acquisition of this territory, manifested on various occasions great reluctance. He opposed the war which he knew would result in the acquisition of Mexican territory, and he afterward said that no one knew the depth and intensity of that opposition. Speaking of it in a subsequent discussion, he made these remarks:

When, accordingly, I was deserted by every friend on this side of the House, including my then honorable colleague among the rest, [Mr. McDuffie,] I was not shaken in the least degree in reference to my course. On the passage of the act recognizing the war, I said to many of my friends that a deed had been done from which the country would not be able to recover for a long time, if ever; and added, it has dropped a curtain between the present and the future, which to me is impenetrable; and for the first time since I have been in public life, I am unable to see the future. I also added that it has closed the first volume of our political history under the Constitution, and opened the second, and that no mortal could tell what would be written in it.

Sir, the boldest hearts if they could have forecasted the events which so soon followed would have doubtless shuddered at the prospect. After the admission of the Territory, Mr. Clay, Mr. Bell, Mr. Berrien, and others expressed similar apprehensions. Mr. Clay declared that he did not believe the connection between our Atlantic States and the group of political communities that might grow up on the Pacific coast would be permanent. But from the moment that the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was ratified and this vast region had become part and parcel of the national territory the minds of American statesmen underwent a remarkable change. It was remarkable in the general concurrence of sentiment among those who had so widely differed, and also in the modification or rather revolution of opinion among many public men who had always been earnest in contending that Congress had no power to engage in works of internal improvement.

The vast increase of the territorial extent of the country, the great change which had taken place in its geographical character and relations had either changed the character of the Constitution without altering its written form, as Mr. Webster predicted, or it developed the necessity of a construction of that instrument which up to that time had been denied by the dominant political party of this country.

That sentiment, which became almost unanimous, was that, if the United States would retain the distant empire which it had wrested from Mexico, there must be a closer and more intimate connection with it than that which mere political authority could secure. In other words, the Pacific and Alantic coasts must be brought together by a railroad connection or a series of railroad connections which no private enterprise could accomplish and was practicable alone under the direction and by the aid of the Federal Government; and the Government which had purchased Louisiana, had acquired Florida, had annexed Texas, had conquered California; which had built light-houses, cleared harbors, and subsidized ocean steamers; which had absolute control of the commerce of the nation, and over its own post-roads, and military roads; such a Government, habituated to the exercise of such powers, and supported by an almost unanimous public opinion, could scarcely afford to surrender such an empire in deference to constitutional puzzles about its power to build railroads.

Senator Seward said that the whole question involved in the building of a Pacific Railroad by Government was, shall this capital, with all its beauties and attractions, be the capital of the United States of all America or shall it dwarf and sink and become the capital of the United States of Atlantic America, while some other city, perhaps Mexico, with all its heroic traditions, will be the capital of the United States of Pacific America? And he expressed the belief that if the people of the Pacific States were not connected, directly and intimately, with the Eastern States, they would do just exactly what the older Atlantic States did with England: set up on the Pacific side of the continent an independent government for themselves. In the face of such considerations statesmen were not disposed to waste time in a sharp search for constitutional objections when they felt that the express spirit and aim of the entire Constitution demanded a work so necessary to the "common defense" of the whole country, so essential to its "domestic tranquillity," so promotive of the "general welfare."

Mr. Davis, of Mississippi, under whose direction, as Secretary of War, explorations of routes to the Pacific coast had been conducted, upon his return to the Senate took a leading part in the debates on this question, and vindicated the constitutionality of the proposed measure upon grounds which in my opinion have not been shaken. In reply to the imputation of a Senator from Tennessee, (Andrew Johnson,) that he had abandoned the doctrine of strict construction of the Constitution and gone over to the latitudinarian school of politicians, he replied that there were two classes of enemies to the Constitution: first, those who by disregarding its limitations and sanctions impaired its authority; secondly, those who by a literal interpretation of it, sticking in the bark, would destroy its spirit and life and efficiency as the organic law of a great republic. I quote this reply because it is as appropriate now as it was then. Though Mr. Davis has incurred the hostility which always falls upon one who has been called to the leadership of a people who were engaged in an unsuccessful movement that involved a revolution in government, his character is a commanding one, not only for great and shining talents and abilities, but also for his spotless morality and the unflecked purity of his public conduct.

Upon this subject men of all parties and from all sections, Seward of New York, Davis of Mississippi, John P. Hale of New Hampshire, Douglas of Illinois, John Bell of Tennessee, Bigler of Pennsylvania, Rusk of Texas, Johnson of Arkansas, united in sentiment and were anxious to co-operate in action. In this they simply represented the popular sentiment of the country, which demanded that the completest, fullest, and strongest and most sensitive connection and sympathy, politically, commercially, and socially, should be established between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts; that this great continent should be indeed one Republic, and not the seat of two civilizations, separate, variant, and hostile. The political parties, republican and democratic, vied with each other in their platform committals as well to the constitutionality as to the necessity of Government aid to the construction of a railroad to the Pacific. I quote from an able speech of a member of the House of Representatives [Mr. CHALMERS, of Mississippi] on this subject.

The democratic party, represented in national convention at Cincinnati in June, 1856, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the democratic party recognizes the great importance, in a political and commercial point of view, of a safe and speedy communication through our own territory between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the Union, and that it is the duty of the Federal Government to exercise all its constitutional power to the attainment of that object, thereby binding the Union of these States in indissoluble bonds and opening to the rich commerce of Asia an overland transit from the Pacific to the Mississippi River and the great lakes of the North."

The republican party also met in convention in June, 1856, in Philadelphia, and passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a railroad to the Pacific Ocean by the most central and practicable route is imperatively demanded by the interests of the whole country, and that the Federal Government ought to render immediate and efficient aid in its construction, and, as an auxiliary thereto, the immediate construction of an emigrant route on the line of the railroad."

Mr. Buchanan was nominated upon the democratic platform, and during the canvass, September 17, 1856, in a letter to the chairman of the democratic executive committee of California, he said:

WHEATLAND, September 17, 1856.

I then desire to state briefly that, concurring with the convention, I am decidedly favorable to the construction of the Pacific Railroad, and I derive the authority to do this from the constitutional power to declare war and the constitutional duty to repel invasion. In my judgment Congress possesses the same power to make appropriations for the construction of this road strictly for the purpose of national defense that it has to erect fortifications at the mouth of the harbor of San Francisco. Indeed the necessity, with a view to repel foreign invasion from California, is as great in the one case as the other. Neither will there be danger from the precedent, for it is almost impossible to conceive that any case attended by such extraordinary and unprecedented circumstances can ever again occur in our history.

Yours, very respectfully,

JAMES BUCHANAN.

To B. F. WASHINGTON, ESQ.,
Chairman Democratic State Central Committee, California.

If before there was any doubt as to the meaning of the platform, this declaration of the candidate settled it. After this declaration he was elected, and in his inaugural address he strongly recommended the same doctrine.

Again in 1860 all parties were united upon this question:

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY COMMITTED TO THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF SUCH AID.

The democratic national convention of 1860, which at Charleston, South Carolina, nominated Stephen A. Douglas for President, adopted as part of their platform the following resolution:

"3. That one of the necessities of the age, in a military, commercial, and postal point of view, is a speedy communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States; and the democratic party pledge such constitutional Government aid as will insure the construction of a railroad to the Pacific coast at the earliest practicable period."

The convention held at Baltimore in the same year, which nominated John C. Breckinridge for President, also adopted as part of its platform the following:

"Whereas one of the greatest necessities of the age, in a political, commercial, postal, and military point of view, is a speedy communication between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the national democratic party do hereby pledge themselves to use every means in their power to secure the passage of some bill, to the extent of the constitutional authority of Congress, for the construction of a Pacific railway, from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean, at the earliest practicable moment."

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY COMMITTED TO THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF SUCH AID.

In the republican platform of 1860 we find the following proposition:

"That a railroad to the Pacific Ocean is imperatively demanded by the interests of the whole country, and that the Federal Government ought to render immediate and efficient aid in its construction."

While, however, there existed this all-pervading harmony of sentiment diversities arose as to the location of the line. This did not, however, spring so much from the intrusion of sectional jealousy as from the fact that it was impossible for the Congress of the United States, representing different and distant States, maintaining systems of commerce and manufactures so diverse, to agree upon any one route or details of any one plan

Perhaps it would be well to state here that a Senator from Virginia (Mr. Mason) was more strongly opposed to the scheme than any other. He said that he believed Congress had not the power to aid in the construction of such a road, and, believing that, he would prefer to lose the entire acquisition of our Pacific coast rather than violate the Constitution in order to retain it. He made a remark which perhaps is profitable for instruction here to-day: that although there was a fixed majority in the Senate in favor of the measure, although there was a very inconsiderable minority, yet, he declared that this minority had defeated the scheme once, and could continue to do so by keeping up an internecine strife among its friends and pitting one route against another, supporting first one side and then the other in their opposition to the different routes proposed. His policy of division and defeat was successful.

It is true, however, that at one time a measure came very near being passed early in the progress of the history of this enterprise. Mr. Rusk, of Texas, in 1852, introduced a bill which had in the other House a well-ascertained majority. It came within two votes of passing the Senate. But for its having been defeated by Senators who doubted the constitutional power of the measure there would this day be a railroad on the very line designated in this bill. All the indications of opinion, then and since, show that this southern route would have been first selected. It was the shortest and cheapest route, with lower elevations to run over and easier grades. Among those who voted against this measure was one of the most distinguished statesmen of the South, who by his uncomplaining and dignified sacrifice of a great future has proved his faith in the doctrine he then advocated. I refer to Mr. Hunter, of Virginia. Shortly after my second election to Congress since the war, he did me the honor to address me a letter which, upon the subject of the constitutional relations of this Government to this great measure, is an argument far above the highest effort of my humblest power, and I will read a small portion of it to the Senate. Mr. Hunter says in this letter:

When informed by a common friend that you expressed some interest to know my opinion of this question of a Texas Pacific Railroad, I thought it might be well to take this occasion to express my views upon the subject. The question is large enough and of an interest sufficiently common to animate the whole South to common deliberation and common efforts, for it is one not only of a large pecuniary interest of trade and commerce,

BUT OF EMPIRE ALSO.

You are perhaps aware that while in the Congress of the United States I opposed the adoption of this as a Federal measure, upon constitutional grounds. I was of those who believed that the progress as well as the harmony of the country required the adoption of the old State-rights doctrines by the Federal Government, upon which I predicated my objection to this as a Federal measure. I still retain these general views; but in many respects they have been modified by further experience and the results of the war. On no subject have they been modified more than in regard to this great transcontinental route through the southern territory of the Union.

After giving the reasons for his belief in the doctrine of State rights, he says:

But while I repeat my growing convictions of this truth with the increase of experience and reflection, I feel bound to acknowledge that we have sometimes interposed objections derived from those doctrines as a barrier to Federal action unnecessarily and to the diminution of the popularity of the creed which has weakened its friends in its support where its observance was essential to harmony and justice. In cases where a work cannot be done by the States and may be effected by the General Government, and is a public necessity or of a great public use, it seems to me that it ought to be derived to the General Government by a much easier rule of implication, so as to secure a necessary public good, than in cases where the power might be used by either the State or Federal Government.

After giving several illustrations he continues:

So, too, when a railroad passing through the Territories of the United States should be necessary for military purposes or as a route for trade, the General Government should not be held to a strict rule of implication in order to derive the power as a military necessity, or for the purpose of regulating trade and commerce between the States and foreign nations, or to erect new States by filling up the Territories with necessary for their support.

* * * * * * *

The States cannot use their power, and lose nothing by allowing the General Government to assume it, and thus enable the settlers of these vast wastes to go to them full-handed, and with all the means and appliances of civilization, and fit them for human uses and the convenient possession of man. To prevent so grand an achievement by interposing objections derived by an extreme extension of the State-rights doctrines, where there is neither use nor necessity for it, is only to bring into odium and ridicule those grand old bulwarks of human liberty, those prime defenses of American harmony and progress. If, in order to preserve these it were necessary to give up all the splendid promises of this great enterprise, I, for one, would do it. But one has need to be sure of his case before he wastes such splendid opportunities for usefulness for the web and woof of an arbitration, no matter how skillfully or what the ingenuity with which it is woven. If our harmonious future progress, our just treatment and freedom depend on a series of arbitrations, as I firmly believe, let us beware how we weaken them by attempting to stretch them to cases which they do not cover in right reason, and where the obtrusion of such considerations can the common sense of mankind. I hope I need not say that I mean no reproach to State-rights men, even to the Pharisees of the school, if true and sincere. I have neither the heart nor the right to cast reproach on any such. I regard the followers of this school as the soldiers of the true cross, politically speaking, if I may use the term in this sense without irreverence, which I surely do not mean, and God forbid that I should cast a word of ridicule or condemnation on any, even the least of them. If in what I have said I cast reproach on any, it falls first on myself. But I regard it as due to the doctrines of that grand old school to relieve them from the odium of interposing them as unnecessary obstacles to progress and improvement. Especially should I regret it if they should delay or prevent the construction of such a work as this, in which the South has so peculiar and the Union so deep an interest. When I speak thus of the peculiar southern interest, I mean the road from Marshall, in Texas, to San Diego.

Just as proposed in this bill.

With all connections with this road it should be made to "prorate" on fair and just terms. If the General Government should aid it to connect with an Atlantic port, it seems to me that the point and continuation of the route should be south of Missouri—say through Vicksburgh, Memphis, or New Orleans, on the Gulf. For this ought to be a southern route, both from considerations of justice and previous pledges on the part of the Government. But from Marshall to San Diego this route ought to be made by Federal means, if necessary. I am anxious that the South should use its influence to that end, both on public opinion and the General Government if possible. The hold of State-rights principles on the South ought not to be weakened, if it be practicable to prevent it, by interposing them unnecessarily to the accomplishment of an object so necessary to restore that section to its just share of power in the Government and its fair share of influence on the public opinion of the country.

He then proceeded to give his ideas as to what should be the provisions of a bill looking to this result, which provisions are in their spirit and substance embodied in the measure that I am now advocating before the Senate.

From the differences just referred to it became manifest that no one single route could give equal advantages to all sections and that to establish a real veritable connection between the Pacific and Atlantic States it must be a connection, not of a section of the Atlantic, but of the whole of it with the whole of the Pacific Coast. To effect this, three or perhaps four roads were deemed advisable; a northern connection, a central connection, and a southern connection.

But while the necessity of this work of union was impressing itself upon the people and Congress, the war of secession broke forth upon the country. The necessities of that war forced the Government to make its connection with the Pacific upon a line farther north than would have been deemed wise or judicious under other circumstances. It was a war line, selected not because it was the best in itself considered as a route for a railroad, or fair and just as a national work, the advantages of which were to be general. Do not understand me, Mr. President, as underestimating the importance and grandeur of this wonderful enterprise, accomplished at such prodigious expense and such masterful energy. Notwithstanding all the abuses with which it has been associated, every man must admit that it is now one of the great arteries of national life, necessary to the hearty action of the whole organization.

But while it is thus so eminently serviceable, its advantages are sectional, and as a Pacific connection it denationalizes the twelve millions of people, (who are from five hundred to eight hundred miles from its eastern terminus,) unless it is considered as only a part of a great and symmetrical system, as yet incomplete, but which by the passage of this bill will be completed and perfected.

Mr. President, to the Northern Pacific the Government has given a land grant of about forty-seven millions of acres of land, the most of which is as valuable as any on the continent, and its friends are confident of a speedy completion, as I am informed by its president, if the relief asked for, in a measure now pending, shall be given. The bill for this purpose passed this Senate without division. To the Union Pacific and Central Pacific the Government has given land grants of fifty million acres and in bonds millions of dollars. The aid to the Texas Pacific is far below that given to the other two and has proved insufficient to construct the line, and the South, in her impoverished condition, has no private capital with which she can assist in building it. As is well said in the report, the aid to the northern lines stands in striking contrast to that bestowed upon the southern line.

Sir, I have a strong persuasion that this inequality has only to be presented in order to insure its correction.

To the Congress of the United States is committed the guardianship of all the interests of all the parts of this nation. We, the different Members and Senators, who represent communities and States widely distant from each other, embracing diverse systems of manufacture, commerce, and agriculture, are under obligations to make known to the national council here the special interests which each Senator represents. It is my duty as a Senator from Mississippi to make known to this national council that the people of my State, who are identified with the people of the South and have the same interest and the same sentiment upon this subject, desire, without any division of sentiment, that this road should be built. Nearly every State Legislature in the South has passed resolutions recommending the aid which is here proposed to be given. Texas, Alabama, Mississippi, Kentucky, Missouri, North Carolina, South Carolina, and the more numerous branch of the Legislature of Georgia, also the Senate of Virginia, all have expressed the desire that the Government should contribute its aid to the construction of this great instrumentality and bond of exchange and intercourse and intercommunication between the Atlantic and the Pacific. Commercial conventions and boards of trade in almost all of the southern cities have given emphatic expression to the same sentiment.

Allow me, sir, to indicate a few of the benefits that will result to the South especially, and through her prosperity to the nation at large from this connection. The South has every condition of soil, climate, and raw material for the development of a great industrial community. She can produce cotton, wool, hemp, and jute. She has vast mineral deposits, especially coal and iron, and, in my opinion, the application of the machinery used in California and Nevada to the gold-mines of Georgia would develop there a product of that precious metal that would add materially to its volume in the world. The Southern States have a vast area of forest growth. I remember that the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] upon his return from his visit to New Orleans, through a section of the South that was not thickly wooded, was deeply impressed with this fact. Mr. Webster, when he traveled through the South, was equally impressed. These immense forests of excellent timber invite manufacturers of wood. Scarcely a product of the North, sir, or of England, is there that may not be as cheaply produced in the South.

She has already begun her industries of the future, and the profits that are realized from them are, in some instances, prodigious. But, to develop these industries, she must have free access to the markets of the world, and be able to attract to herself the skill and capital and the appliances of the machinery of the North. Nature has given her a soil and climate peculiarly adapted to the growth of cotton. It can be raised more cheaply than in any other section of the globe. The crop of last year was 4,700,000 bales. It will probably be larger next year, perhaps 5,000,000 bales. The only other countries producing cotton, to any extent, are Egypt, India, and China. Last year England took 67 per cent. of her cotton from the United States. The manufactures last year amounted to an equivalent of nearly 6,000,000,000 pounds. I am indebted for these statistics to a very able pamphlet upon the subject of cotton manufactures, issued by Mr. Edward Atkinson, of Boston, which I recommend to Senators as a perfect quarry of suggestive information. I am also indebted to an intelligent gentleman from Boston, Mr. Charles Coffin, who made an able argument before the Committee on Patents on the subject of the machinery of this country and its productive power.

The time has come when the Southern States, in the restoration of her people to the control of their own affairs, (assured to them by the just and wise southern policy of the present Administration,) and through the genius of American inventors, surpassing that of any other country on the globe—the time has come, I say, when she can lay her hand upon a goodly share of the trade of the world.

The conditions that have been largely instrumental in building up the manufactures of England and preventing the development of manufacturing wealth and enterprise in this country are undergoing important changes. One great element in England's favor has been the employment of cheap labor. A very intelligent European writer who visited this country during the centennial exposition expresses the opinion that the marvelous inventiveness of the American mind and the superior aptitude of the American laborer to handle machinery will largely counteract the effect of this advantage in England's favor. Mr. Atkinson, in the paper referred to, states that labor in New England is as cheap as that in Old England.

But, sir, the conditions of soil and climate and society in the South enable the employment of labor as cheaply as it can be secured in England. The prices of lands and of houses and of rents of every kind and of food in England are high, and the taxes are burdensome, and these weigh heavily over labor, whether levied upon it or not. In the South land, food, raiment, and shelter are cheap, and taxation is growing every year less burdensome. In everything except capital, skill, and experience the manufacturers of the Southern States are on an equality with the manufacturers of England, and the saving per pound in baling, waste, and transportation must be immense. Throughout the vast territories of the South are great rivers, which neither freeze in winter nor dry up in summer, that can turn her spindles all the year round, while the English manufacturer must mine his coal a thousand or fifteen hundred feet below the surface of the earth and transport it to his mill. Nowhere in the world can this great staple be manufactured so cheaply as on the spot where it is grown. And, at the same time, these manufactures, thus fostered and growing up, will develop the diversities of Southern agriculture to an extent that will make her land blossom like the rose.

Although four million seven hundred thousand bales of cotton were raised last year, the Southern States have, as yet, but a small percentage of their cotton lands under cultivation. These lands can produce enough to clothe the world. It is estimated that not more than two hundred millions of people are yet reached by machine-made cotton, but that there are fully six hundred millions that will yet be clothed with fabrics wrought by machinery. The spindles of the world are sixty-eight millions, thirty-nine millions of which are English, nine millions six hundred thousand American, and about twenty millions throughout Europe. They give employment to about one million men and women, boys and girls; and the entire manufacture amounts to an equivalent of about ten billions of yards. That this product, enormous as it is, is to be doubled in the next few years is one of the probable events of the future. The entire amount of cotton imported into Great Britain from 1850 to 1860 was 1,006,000,000 pounds. From 1866 to 1877, eleven years, the amount was 17,148,000,000 pounds. Taking it for granted that there is to be a corresponding development in the future, in what direction shall we look for a market?

The fields which are most inviting are Mexico, South America, China, Japan, Australia, and the islands of the Pacific. In order to reach them, a railroad from the cotton fields of the South to the Pacific is absolutely necessary. Sir, these commodities can never be sent from five hundred to eight hundred miles to reach the eastern terminus of the Union and Central Pacific at Omaha, there to meet the burdens of the high rates upon freight and travel imposed by these companies. Look at our trade with Mexico. Its commerce is almost wholly in the hands of English merchants; nor can we ever open an extensive commerce with that country till we reach it by rail. The Mexican government having no well-regulated system of finances, frequently, indeed commonly, resorts to forced loans, taking vouchers which are receivable as customs dues; and as England is the chief creditor of Mexico, these vouchers fall into the hands of the English importer, at the foreign discount. Now, nearly all the foreign goods are entered at Vera Cruz, but a railroad running along the northern border of Mexico will bring about a new state of affairs. Our exports to Mexico in 1877 were $4,509,000, while our imports reached the sum of $15,444,000. Of this amount $5,205,000 was in merchandise, and the balance in specie.

I have before me a list of the articles imported, and also a list of our exports, from which it will be seen that there is no article contained in it which cannot be produced in the Southern States, and as cheaply as anywhere in the world. They are such articles as breadstuffs, cotton goods, cordage, jeans, tobacco, household furniture, bacon, butter, lard, sheep, Indian corn, &c.

All that we need is the demand for the articles at our hands, and the only thing necessary to create the demand is a cheap, easy, and direct communication with the market, which this railroad will provide.

In some excellent letters which I have seen in the Boston Journal of Commerce, there are some significant facts in relation to our trade with South America. Take Peru, for instance. The population of this country is two million six hundred and seventy-three thousand. Our trade with it is small. Our exports to that country last year amounted to the insignificant sum of $1,545,000; our imports still less. Half of the value of our imports is nitrate of soda. A list of the articles exported, and also the exports of England to that country, I have in my hand, (for which I am indebted to Mr. Coffin,) from which it will be seen that every article sent to that country could be produced with cheapness and in abundance in the Southern States. At present that country is far distant from us, and inaccessible to us; but with the construction of this line to San Diego her people will become our near neighbors.

The western coast of South America is a rich field for American manufacturers in the future. At present the trade of Chili is almost wholly in the hands of Great Britain. The population is about two millions. The country can only be reached, at present, by vessels sailing around Cape Horn or through the Straits of Magellan, or via the Isthmus of Panama. The English line of steamships from Liverpool to that isthmus connects with a fleet on the other side, touching at every port on the western coast of South America between Panama and Valparaiso. Our own manufactures are sent by sail around the Cape. The construction of a southern line of railroad to San Diego would open a new vein of traffic with that entire section. We have a large and rapidly increasing trade with those vigorous countries under the Southern Cross, Australia and New Zealand, peopled by the Anglo-Saxon race, of high civilization, consuming a great variety of productions. Our exports to those countries in 1876 amounted to nearly $4,000,000, and in 1877 they were nearly $6,000,000. The construction of a southern line of railroad to the Pacific will bring us into more intimate relations with these countries. The population of Australia now numbers about two millions; New Zealand, about four hundred thousand. They are countries that already have twenty-six hundred miles of railroad in operation. Last year we sent them a great variety of our manufactured goods. With the exception of petroleum, every article of export to these countries from our own can be manufactured just as cheaply in the Southern States as anywhere in the world. And then, sir, there are China and Japan. I have not time now to go further into this subject. It is one with which Senators are very familiar.

Before the war, the trade that we had with China and Japan in manufactured cotton was 4,000,000 yards. The commerce of England was much less, amounting to only 130,000 yards. How changed were the conditions after the war. I learn from an intelligent author, whose work I have here, that we now send ont about 11,000,000 yards; England, 263,000,000. But this will not clothe one out of ten of the inhabitants of that land. The population of China is estimated at from four hundred and fifty to five hundred millions. The commerce of both countries as yet furnishes China with but little more than half a yard per capita of manufactured cotton goods. Our cheap cottons would find a demand in that market of at least 250,000,000 of yards, without displacing or coming in competition with the trade of England.

Upon this point I will give the views of Mr. Atkinson as set forth in the pamphlet I have already referred to. He says:

> Leaving to our competitors the share in the supply of the world's need of cotton goods which they have already secured, there yet remain outside of Europe and the United States, in Asia, Africa, and South America from five hundred to eight hundred millions of people whose clothing consists mainly of cotton cloth. It must now be spun and woven by the slow process of hand-work. Can we obtain our share in this unworked field? Four hundred million persons, at five pounds per head, would require from our Southern States four million additional bales of cotton, and would call for forty millions more cotton-spindles in Europe or America to work them up. Who will raise this cotton and where shall these spindles be constructed?

Now, three of the four great factors in the problem which is here presented are more within the reach of the South than of any country on earth. We have, first, the cheapness of the raw material; next, all the elements of cheap manufacturing; and, third, our capacity to exchange for the products of other lands at a profit. But the fourth and essential element in that problem we have not, and that is cheapness of transportation, and we cannot have it until this road here proposed puts it into communication with this vast demand, which, increasing the consumption, will increase so vastly our production, and thereby our wealth in like proportion.

These are some of the benefits, sir, in a commercial point of view, which the South expects from the construction of this great enterprise.

I have consumed so much of the time of Senators that I will not dwell upon the economies to the Government that will be promoted by the completion of this great highway of commerce. I have seen estimates, the correctness of which I do not doubt, which convince me that there will be a saving simply in the appropriations for our Army of nearly $7,000,000 per annum.

In view of all these important considerations, how utterly small appears this suggestion about a "subsidy" for the sole benefit of a private corporation or a few privileged individuals. Sir, any Senator who will raise his voice or give his vote in this matter with reference to the private or personal advantage of any individual or association of individuals, or with reference to the hurt or frustration of mere personal interests, will be trifling with a grave and important subject, one involving the prosperity of the nation and the fortunes of millions of its people.

Government cannot make any expenditure which is not incidentally for the benefit of individuals, if by that you mean the people who perform the duties which the Government requires and receive the remuneration which the law provides. Who gets the whole of your postal expenditure but the mail contractors and the railroad corporations and the officers of your Post-Office Department? Does the Government get anything in return? No, sir. The people get in return safe and speedy communication and the possibility of carrying on the vast business interests of this vast continent. Sir, there is much in the talk about soulless corporations and their vast power which is the mere exaggeration of rhetoric.

What is a corporation but an association of individuals? They are the agencies which have always been employed in modern times for the accomplishment of enterprises of any great magnitude; and while it is true that in the general demoralization which has taken place as a consequence of war great abuses of trust have been committed by officials of corporations, as by officials of government, and also by individuals, it is none the less true that corporations have been among the most efficient means of advancing the progress of humanity and civilization and education and religion. In a country of small equal fortunes, where there is no great centralized government, large and important enterprises have always been achieved by corporations and cannot be accomplished without them. They are the only agencies open to the contributions of poor men, who if left to themselves would be powerless, as they could neither share the privilege of taking part in works of any magnitude or participate in the profits which the use of vast masses of capital insures. I believe I am warranted in saying that if the political history of English-speaking people proves any one thing it is the influence of corporations in preserving constitutional liberty, in spreading public spirit, in educating and enlarging the national ambition, in bringing within the reach of the poor and the laboring man those scientific achievements which, put into practical use, elevate and improve the whole people. They are institutions, sir, which have grown up in society as society grows more free and more independent of the agencies of government. Indeed, they are the institutions of decentralization, and have been the channel through which the exercise of the functions of sovereign power have been abstracted from government, and transmitted into the domain of individual freedom, activity, and enterprise.

One or two points more and I shall close.

There is no doubt about the fact, Mr. President, that whatever may be the material condition of the people of this country, there prevails in American society more of discontent and complaint, more of tendency to social irregularities and outbreak, than has ever existed at any former period of our country's history. Many causes have been assigned for this condition of things. Political maladministration, Federal and State, errors in financial legislation, gross oppression and injustice in our systems of taxation, the incorporation into our society of some elements, causing a tendency to intestine commotions that have never been observable in our earlier history—each and all have been assigned with equal earnestness by the different advocates of the various remedies for the existing state of things.

Whatever may be, sir, the correctness or incorrectness of these theories upon this subject, and perhaps there may be something of truth and error in all of them, there are two causes which I think have been too much overlooked. One is, the prostrated and impoverished condition of one section of the country, embracing fully one-third of its population. In the South, by the results of the war alone, an immense amount of productive capital was destroyed. Then, the market value of slaves, whatever may have been the inferiority, as alleged, of slave labor compared with free labor, has also been annihilated. That event certainly precipitated half a million of opulent families living in affluence and luxury into extreme poverty and destitution. The effects, sir, of such a catastrophe as that would shock the prosperity of any commercial community holding relations of trade with them. Sir, it at once destroyed the market for all the luxuries and appointments of comfortable life which that condition of society in the South had created and maintained. The demand in the South for jewelry, costly stones, fine equipages, palatial furniture, the finest cloths, silks, alpacas and cashmeres, has ceased. The immense amounts expended in travel and sojourn in the watering-places of the North, and in our great cities, all these have disappeared, and with them an immense source of profitable exchange.

Now, sir, one of the great national wants is the restoration of that market or its equivalent. It lies in the restoration of the South to the full vigor of her capabilities. It can be secured by the resuscitation of her commercial and industrial life and the opening of new fields for emancipated labor. Sir, the completion of this road will go far toward that consummation.

But, sir, there is still another cause. The conditions of American society are, for the first time in a half century, stagnant and unprogressive. The forty millions of the people of this country cannot safely remain in this condition. They are energetic, aspiring, restless, eager. The whole history of the American people has been one of dramatic movement and interest. For a long time it was the march of emigration to the West, the advance of pioneers, the receding of frontiers, the felling of forests, the opening of fields, the rearing of school-houses and court-houses, the organization of society into communities, and communities into Territories, and Territories into States—opening up civil employments as objects of a noble ambition, and giving all that was aspiring and energetic and progressive full scope for unlimited development.

Then came the acquisition of the great Territories of Louisiana and Florida, followed some years after by the annexation of Texas. Then the Mexican war, which gave a grand field for employment and activity to the martial spirit of the country. Then the acquisition of our Pacific empire, the discovery of the gold mines, the rush of population to that shore, the vast influx of the precious metals into this country, increasing the prices and giving an impulse to industry in all its forms. Then came, sir, the great contest about slavery in the Territories, followed by a war which strained the energies of both sections to their utmost, accompanied as it was with the grand enterprises of Government subsidies and aids to railroad connections between these Atlantic and Pacific States, giving employment to thousands of laborers and opening demands for innumerable markets, filling up the intermediate country with population, and with towns and cities, and commerce, and great commonwealths—when, sir, all of a sudden there is a pause in this grand movement. No railroad enterprises are going on. Thousands of laborers have been thrown out of employment on that account, and that has stopped the demand for the production of all other manufactures and industry, and this by inevitable law stops the profits of merchandise. And this eager people, in the very youth of their vigorous existence, with no objects of internal development, with nothing of external progress, find themselves expending their energies in communistic excitement and intestine commotion. Here I think you have the most efficient cause of that hidden discontent which flamed out so fearfully but a year ago.

Now, sir, I hold to the doctrine very firmly that it does not fall within the functions of Government to give bounties to capital or employment to labor. I do not believe that either the interest or the dignity of the laboring classes will ever be subserved in that way. But if in the prosecution of a great national policy capital will find new channels of profitable investment and labor new fields of remunerating employment, such results are strong arguments in favor of that policy. Sir, the construction of this road will throw open these new channels to capital and also a new field for the peaceful employment of the labor and for the development of the resources of wealth, of strength, and of power which lie in the recesses of the vast regions between the western lands of Texas and the Pacific coast.

I ask the attention of the Senators to the views of one whose fame needs no tribute from me, but whom I am proud to call my friend. I allude to Hon. A. H. STEPHENS, of Georgia:

> A liberalized currency would tend greatly to relieve the producing sections of the country; but such influences are a mere drop in the bucket as means of rehabilitating the South, the Southwest, and the Southeast, when compared with the building of the Texas and Pacific Railroad, and as a means of reviving the industries of the whole country. At least twenty States would instantly feel the quickening impulse and would throb with rejuvenated vitality in all their industries. Think of the vitalizing effect upon southern industries, particularly resulting from the expenditure of the money necessary to construct the road; of the thousands of mechanics, unwilling idlers now; of the young men of education now vainly seeking clerkships; of the laborers in every pursuit of industry, who would be provided with remunerative employment were the enterprise set in motion. Besides, too, the increased value of land and other property in the States east of the Mississippi would be enormous. In this respect alone the increased wealth to Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Kentucky, Tennessee, the Carolinas, and Virginia from increase of business and travel over this road would amount to figures that would startle us now could they be given.
> What we want now is stimulation of business. Just as in the human system stagnation superinduces congestion, so we are suffering in matters of commerce and manufactures. Money is locked up because there is nothing to invite it from the coffers of capitalists. Ten millions of dollars spent in the ensuing year in an enterprise like the Texas and Pacific would start one thousand millions. Iron-founderies and steam-mills now inactive would be revived. Timber, cross-ties, blacksmiths' materials, iron and wood in all their varied uses, would be in great demand, and in the work of constructing this great continental enterprise there would be employment for all kinds of railroad labor, from that of the chain-carrier to that of the bridge-builder. There would indeed come a great business and industrial revival far exceeding any ever known in America. Immigration that has heretofore shunned the South would then be tempted and invited because of facilities for reaching that section never enjoyed before and because of the inducements of soil and climate.

I have, sir, but one or two remarks to make in addition, and those I should like to address to the Senators from the East, and I ask that they will not consider it an intrusion upon their reserve. I do not make the appeal to the Northwest because I know that we shall receive a degree of support from that section; nor to the South, because the South is almost a unit upon the subject of a great southern transcontinental route. There have been no diversities among us that are worth mentioning, and the only difference, it will be seen, will be a difference as to details. I am most anxious to commend this measure to the favor of Senators from the Eastern States. I regard that section of this Union as being now in a sense the especial representative of the most precious principle of our American Constitution at this time, the most conservative part of our Government, that which alone will protect us from democratic absolutism, which is always the sure forerunner of imperialism. I mean the federal principle of our system, that which co-ordinates the States of this Union and makes them coequals in dignity and power.

Sir, when we look at the power that the six New England States and two or three other Eastern States of still smaller population have in this Government, we can but be struck with the extent of the political authority they exercise; the power of positive, affirmative legislation, to say nothing of their negative power, as compared with the population upon which it is based. Four millions of people have an actual affirmative force in the legislation of the nation as great as, perhaps greater than, that of fifteen millions in other States, simply by virtue of the principle of State sovereignty and State equality in this Chamber. It is a principle which is essential, in my opinion, to the preservation of liberty on the American continent; but the people in some parts of this country are growing restive under this inequality of popular representation; complaints are being made as to this great disparity. I have no sympathy whatever with such complaints. The right of these States to equality here, irrespective of population, is as sacred as the Constitution itself, and if impaired in the least, the whole system of constitutional liberty in America will fall into irretrievable ruin.

But, Mr. President, this sentiment of reverence for the Constitution is not, I fear, as deep and abiding in this country as it once was. The thought to which late events in our history have given most frequent expression is that "the will of the nation, as one people, is supreme," and that this will must not be subordinated to a political form or a political dogma; and that if there be in the Constitution any provision whereby the people in their action are prevented from effecting amendments to it, it will not be a revolution when the spirit of the people, in its real strength, breaks through the system by which it is gyved. This is the view which is now put forth with greatest acceptance by the political philosophers in this country of the present day. I do not concur in it; but if the contest for supremacy ever arises in this country (may God forefend that it ever shall!) it is a fact which the history of all popular governments attests, that constitutional right must give way before numerical power. The mere holders of the symbols of power cannot stand before the actual possessors of power.

Such a contest may be averted by exercising these vast powers in a spirit of correspondence with the will and interests of the whole people and not as representatives exclusively of the local interests of their constituencies. It is in this way, sir, that the hereditary principle of the British government has been preserved and made to accord and co-operate with the elective principle in the promotion of the greatness and glory of that Empire. I would therefore invoke these Senators when they come to act upon this question to look in a large, liberal, and benignant spirit to the interests of the twelve millions of people who are deeply and directly concerned in its success; and if they can find it not inconsistent with the interests of the whole country to give it their support, that they will do it. Their constitutional power will thus have, sir, a solid foundation in the affections and gratitude of a constituency far wider than that whose suffrages have sent them here.

Mr. President, if I thought that this measure could have any ill effect upon any section or any interest of the country I would not advocate it. I have attempted to commend it to the favorable action of this body because I believe it will, while benefiting the whole country, infuse new life and prosperity in the South and give to the people of that section the assurance that in this great Union their material interests are considered and promoted and that they are to become in future full participants in its greatness, and glory, and prosperity.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate on this question, but I do not wish to trouble the Senate at this time. I merely give notice that at some other day, when there is less press of business, I shall ask the Senate to indulge me in some remarks upon the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The unfinished business of yesterday will now be resumed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1021) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and the bill (S. AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-routes in the several States therein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3259) providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, the pending question being on the amendment reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask that the first section of the substitute may now be read. As it has once been read in full, I suggest that it need not appear again in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The first section of the amendment will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the first section of the substitute.

Mr. INGALLS. If there be no objection, I move that this section be agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will wait until the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] are in their seats. They have been sent for and are expected in the Chamber every moment. I know they desire to be present, and I trust a delay of a moment or two will be given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to considering the amendment of the committee by sections? The Chair hears none. Is there objection to the section just read?

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope that action will be delayed until the Senators I have named appear.

Mr. INGALLS. This bill has been under discussion since yesterday; and the Senators to whom the Senator from Missouri has referred were aware that it would be called up for consideration immediately upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi. I feel that it is unjust to delay the consideration of public business in order to await the convenience of Senators who were aware that this bill was to come before the Senate. I shall therefore ask that the business may be proceeded with in order, subject to the action of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I trust that the section will be reported again for information. If that is not done I can assure the Senator that he will not get action until those Senators have time to come in, for I shall certainly consume that much of the time of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no doubt of the ability of the Senator from Missouri to consume the time of the Senate unprofitably; he has shown his capacity in that way too often.

Mr. DORSEY. On the 16th instant, when the Senator from Kansas reported this bill, he called the attention of the Senate to it particularly and gave notice then that he would call it up for action the following Monday, which was a week ago from last Monday. For some reason the bill did not come up then. It was taken up yesterday after the morning hour expired, and then the Senator in charge gave way for the consideration of another question. When it was taken up yesterday no one seemed to understand the question at all. Several Senators expressed surprise that the bill was before the Senate. We occupied an hour or two here in a dallying sort of way without anybody appearing to know exactly what was being done. Then the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] moved, inasmuch as the Senate did not understand this bill and did not seem to be able to understand it, that we adjourn until to-day, and he suggested that each Senator take a copy of the bill home with him, so that he could read it last night and this morning and we could take it up to-day and proceed with it. To-day the Senator from Kansas gave way to the Senator from Mississippi as per agreement, and the understanding then was that we should proceed with this bill immediately after the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi, and as the hope was expressed by the committee, in which I trust the Senate will concur, for the purpose of finishing the bill to-day. Now the Senator from Missouri and probably other Senators suggest a delay because one or two Senators are out of the Chamber. Those Senators have known that this bill would be proceeded with to its passage at the earliest day possible, and if they are not here it is not the fault of the committee. I hope we shall proceed with the bill until it is completed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first section will be again reported.

Mr. SAUNDERS. If there has been any understanding of the Senate by which this bill is to have precedence, I shall give way of course and let ti proceed, but if not I wish to insist upon the Calendar being taken up and gone through with. There is a bill that has been on the Calendar for more than two months in favor of organizing the Territory of Lincoln. There are more than twenty thousand people there to-day representing every State in this Union, and they are unanimously asking that this Territory may be organized. On that account I shall insist upon going on with the Calendar unless there was an understanding that the District bill should come up to-day. If such has been the understanding, then I shall give way to that bill for the present.

Mr. DORSEY. Nearly an hour was consumed this morning by the Senate in endeavoring to determine what the order of business was and what was before the Senate. I supposed after that long debate that everybody understood that the bill to provide a permanent form of government for the District was the unfinished business that came over from yesterday, and of course is the business now before the Senate. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will not move to lay that business aside in order to take up his bill. When the time comes I shall be glad, and I presume the Senator in charge of the District bill will be glad, to aid the Senator from Nebraska in a proper way; but the District bill is now before the Senate and I for one insist that it shall remain so until it is disposed of either by being passed or voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and can only be displaced by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I said I would certainly not insist upon going on with the Calendar if such was the understanding; but after this bill is concluded I shall ask that we take up the Calendar and proceed with it as the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri insist on the first section being reported again?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first section will be read.

The Secretary read the first section of the committee's amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not hear the remarks of the Senator from Kansas yesterday. I reserve the right to offer amendments to this section or any of the sections of the amendment before the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. The right is undoubted in the case of any Senator or any section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the section.

The section was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the second section of the amendment.

The Secretary read section 2 of the proposed substitute.

Mr. BAYARD. On line 18 of section 2 I move to strike out the word "three," and insert "one," and the letter "s" in the word "years," so as to read:

> The two persons appointed from civil life shall, at the time of their appointment, be citizens of the United States, and shall have been actual residents of the District of Columbia for one year next before their appointment, and have during that period claimed residence nowhere else.

I know the constitution of no State which requires a longer actual residence, a fixed residence, with the intention of remaining, to qualify a resident to become a citizen of that State. Some of the States, indeed, I believe shorten the period of residence. One of the objections to the government in this District for some years past has been that persons not identified in interest with the local population and property-owners have had too much to do with their government. The fact of a long residence may not always give a man a proper interest, or make him a fit person to take charge of the affairs of a community. It is the identification of interest and intelligence necessary for the office that qualifies the person for the appointment. Any man, it seems to me, who is qualified to vote for another for an office should by law be qualified to be voted for; and this District would be the exceptional case that would require a longer residence in the official than in the persons creating him by their votes. There might possibly be an exclusion of very fit and proper candidates for this office if this term of residence, unusual in the laws of any community known to me, should be insisted upon. I therefore move my amendment, which will allow the District commissioners to be chosen from persons who are residents of this District and have been continuously so with the intention of remaining for one year, if it meets the approval of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. The provision in the House bill upon the subject of the length of residence that should entitle a person to be appointed commissioner was five years. There was a difference of opinion in the committee as to the term that should be prescribed. Of course there is nothing in the nature of things that renders a man specially competent to discharge the duties of his position from the mere fact of his having resided here a time greater or less than that prescribed in the bill. One great cause of complaint that the citizens of the District have frequently urged has been that strangers have been sent among them to rule over them, and harass them, and eat out their substance; and it was thought best, in order to comply with the sentiments of the people upon this subject and to carry out the general ideas of local self-government that prevail to so great an extent among the American people, that a period of residence and citizenship should be provided which would prevent this cause of complaint hereafter. The committee believed that as a proper measure of compromise between the term prescribed by the House, which seemed to them to be excessive, and the condition that had heretofore existed, in which no term at all was prescribed, the term of three years would perhaps be best adapted to compose existing differences and ally hostile interests in support of the measure.

I may say in passing that it has been rumored, with what degree of veracity I do not know, that the provision of the House bill was inserted for the express purpose of hitting a particular case. If this be true, of course it would be unwise in the Senate to agree to it.

I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware, because the committee considered the whole subject and instructed me to insist upon the period prescribed in the substitute. There is no special reason that I know of why one year or three years should be prescribed; but the period of three years is one that would enable a person residing here to familiarize himself with the wants of the people, with their peculiarities, and with the necessities of administration here. It seems to me to be appropriate, and I trust the Senate will agree to the provision as reported by the committee.

Mr. BAYARD. I would ask the honorable Senator whether he can name any other community in the United States where a longer residence than one year is required to enable a man to become a voter and to hold office.

Mr. INGALLS. I cannot. Not having the volume of Colonial Charters and Constitutions here, I should not be able to state definitely the fact upon that subject. I know, however, that the Constitution of the United States in treating of offices as important as those of Senator and Member of the House of Representatives merely insists that persons elected to those offices shall be inhabitants of the States where they reside. Of course, as the Senator from Delaware is well advised, there is nothing in the natural limitations of time that would render one period essential rather than another. I believe that, in consequence of the peculiar character of the population here, being to a great extent transitory and fugitive, and owing to the conflicting relations between the Government and the corporation, it would be advisable to prescribe a longer period of residence than exists in States, because it will require more time to become familiar with the necessities of the community.

Mr. BAYARD. It seems to me that the Senator's argument is rather against himself. He says that this is a community in which the mass is very frequently varied.

Mr. INGALLS. Oh, no; I say there is a large transitory element here.

Mr. BAYARD. Very well. If there is a large transitory element, then there will be in proportion a less permanent element. The Senator from Kansas proposes to make a discrimination in favor of the permanent population, which will exclude a larger portion of the people than in any other community in the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator mean to say that the permanent population here is not as much entitled to respect as the transitory?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is entitled to equal respect.

Mr. BAYARD. It is very plain that in any community where there is a transitory population there will be fewer of the permanent population, and yet the Senator would diminish the right of choice by limiting the class from whom the commissioners can be selected to a smaller class than any other community known to me in the United States. I know those States considered most conservative in their frame-work of government are satisfied to make the residence of an inhabitant for one year the prescription for his citizenship. It is so I think in Virginia; it is so in Maryland; it is so in the little State where I live. I believe a shorter period is generally assigned in the other States. Perhaps the period is shorter in States where the desire exists to encourage population and to grant the right of citizenship as fast as they can. Therefore, unless there be some reason which has not yet been given, (but on the contrary the reasons which have been given rather militate against the proposition of the Senator,) there is no good cause for prolonging the time of residence in the District to prevent a man from holding office longer than exists in other and well-settled communities all over the country.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, it will be observed, on looking into the substitute reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, that the three commissioners are virtually the rulers of the city. They are to exercise the chief and a very high authority. The policy of the measure is to select persons who are thoroughly identified with the people of this District. As my colleague on the committee has very justly said, a large part of the population of this city is very transitory. A year here, looking to citizenship and the purposes of citizenship, is briefer, in one sense, than elsewhere. It is very doubtful, if a man stays here but a year, whether he is going to stay any longer or not. We thought that three years would be a reasonable time for one to live here in order that the people and the President who appoints these officers might be satisfied that such person as might be appointed was fully and thoroughly identified with the people. Besides, these commissioners, exercising such high power, ought to be very familiar with the circumstances and wants of the people; they ought to be familiar with the condition of the city, with all its localities; and such familiarity would not be probably gained by a person who had resided here simply twelve months. And in twelve months, in a city like this, a man would scarcely become very well acquainted with the people and their respective wants, of all classes and conditions. The committee thought, on due consideration, looking at the action of the House, that three years would be a reasonable time—not extravagant one way or the other. That length of time seems to me reasonable and conservative.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I rise to support the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware to make this limitation of residence one year instead of three. I do not think, under the condition of the District and the relations of the United States to it, that there ought to be any provision at all of that character, but I shall not oppose a provision of one year.

This bill provides for the United States paying one-half of the expense of carrying on the government of the District. The United States, therefore, ought to have, through its Executive and Senate, the right, inasmuch as it pays half the expense, to select for a part of the governors of the District, and more than one as this bill provides, any citizen of the United States whom the Chief Magistrate and the Representatives of all the States and of all the tax-payers think is a fit man, even if he has not been a permanent resident in this District for three years. It seems so to me. Half the money comes from the whole people of the United States, and then the Constitution itself provides that this District, in which nobody is a resident (except those in jail) without his free and voluntary consent, shall be a district in which Congress is to exercise exclusive legislation. Congress is the legislative power of the District, and that Congress is the Congress of the whole people. This is a place for the whole people of the United States to have an interest in and to take care of and to pay the expenses of, as it does now by this proposition to the extent of one-half, and indirectly to a much larger degree.

Therefore it appears to me, with great deference to the opinions of the gentlemen of the committee, that the proposition of the Senator from Delaware to bring it down to one year ought to be satisfactory even to the committee.

Mr. MERRIMON. It seems to me inasmuch as Congress and the American people through Congress exercise such absolute power over the District of Columbia and the people who reside here, that it would be but reasonable and Congress ought to be content to rule them through persons who live here and know their wishes and their wants better than strangers can know them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but according to the statement both of the gentleman in charge of the bill and my honorable friend from North Carolina, a very large proportion of the people in this District are not citizens of the District, but people of the United States who are lawfully here for necessary purposes, and they are to be governed as well as the others.

Mr. MERRIMON. But a large majority of the people here are permanent residents of this city. A population of eighty or ninety thousand people are as much at home in the District of Columbia as the Senator is in Vermont or myself in North Carolina. They are attached to their homes, and they want to be governed by their own people. That is a natural impulse that they should desire to be governed by their own people. Now, if we intend to consult the wishes of the people of the District at all, will anybody doubt that if the people were going to elect their commissioners they would not elect a man who had been here a less time than three years?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would depend upon a great many circumstances.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think on looking at the circumstances, taking a reasonable view of them, that the people would naturally want to elect a man who was identified with them, and who they knew was identified with them by the length of time he had been here; they would want to take one who was familiar with their wants, who had lived among them a long time, a man whom they had come to know. They would not want a stranger. It is repulsive to human nature to have a stranger rule over you. There is no government, as a friend beside me says, so hateful as that of a stranger.

Mr. BAYARD. I want to ask my honorable friend from North Carolina whether the constitution of North Carolina requires a longer residence than twelve months for a person to become a voter or be capable of being appointed to office in that State.

Mr. MERRIMON. The old constitution required a residence of two years. The new constitution requires a residence of one. But, as was said by my colleague on the committee, who has charge of the bill, the state of society here is very different from what it is in North Carolina, or Vermont, or Delaware. Persons who go there for purposes of citizenship very soon become identified with the State and its wants, and their opinions and purposes are pointed out by the circumstances. Here when a stranger comes it is very difficult to say, sometimes it is difficult for himself to say, how long he intends to stay. He comes to be employed by the Government or to live off the Government for a while. In the course of a few months he becomes tired and passes away, although he may at first have come with a view to stay.

But furthermore, in large cities like this the stranger, even though he should come for the purpose of citizenship, learns slowly about localities, the various ramifications of interests and wants in a great city. We put it upon the ground that it was reasonable and just to the people of Washington to fix the term at three years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, to strike out "three years" and insert "one year."

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 23, noes 18.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the section as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand that this vote on the section does not preclude amendments to be offered afterward.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before that is put, there are one or two verbal amendments which I will merely suggest for the consideration of the committee, to make more clear what they desire. In line 9 after the word "limited" I move to insert the words "or provided;" so as to read that these commissioners "shall exercise all the powers and authorities now vested in the commissioners of the District of Columbia except as are hereinafter limited or provided." There may be some cases of provision which would not operate, technically considered by a court, as a limitation.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. The Chair hears none and it is agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then in line 10 after the word "limitations" I move to insert the words "and duties;" so as to carry out the same idea to save any question in court.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to this amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to give notice now that I reserve the right to ask a vote in the Senate on the amendment adopted on the motion of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In line 12 I move an amendment, which will be of substance, and therefore I call special attention to it. I move to insert after the word "detailed" the words "from time to time;" so that that clause will read:

> The commissioner, who shall be an officer detailed from time to time from the Corps of Engineers by the President for this duty, shall not be required to perform, &c.

Another clause provides apparently for his being appointed once in three years and to hold for three years. I think in the very nature of the bill this detail from the Army, from the Corps of Engineers, ought to be a detail which may be made just as it is for the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds, from time to time. The exigencies of war, or some public service, or some disqualification that is discovered, some unfitness of this officer, ought to allow the Commander-in-Chief of the Army from time to time to detail the engineer who is to act; and I think from our experience it will be found that that power of the President of detailing from time to time (that is to detail the officer and remove him just as often as he pleases) will not be in the least abused as it never has been in respect to the management of public buildings and grounds. It might be found a very great and necessary convenience in the way of authority in cases that might arise.

Mr. INGALLS. It is my understanding, and I believe it was the understanding of the committee, that the power of the President to detail was not considered to be exhausted by a single exercise, and that in detailing it was not necessary to be understood that it was a permanent disposition of the services of that officer. If that is not clear in the bill, or if the meaning of the word is not distinct, I should have no objection to the words the Senator from Vermont proposes being inserted, because that was the purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I certainly myself put the opposite construction on it, which led me to make the proposal.

Mr. HOAR. I move to reconsider the vote by which the committee just struck out the words "three years" and substituted "one year."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us dispose of this amendment first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a pending amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SARGENT. It seems to me there is an objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont. I do not think that the third of this board ought to be as transient as that amendment supposes. It seems to me that the other provision of the bill which contemplates, unless removed for cause, that he shall hold for three years, is a very much better theory for a government for a city like this. The idea of detailing a person from time to time, so that by changes he shall—hardly seems consistent with the duties that are to be intrusted to him. If the other commissioners are to hold for three years, he ought to hold for three. If it is objectionable to use an engineer on account of the exigencies of war that may require him elsewhere, then strike him out and put somebody else in that can perform the duty. If that is not the case, however, and it is likely a man might be able to serve three years, his selection ought to hold good as in the other cases and he ought to be allowed to give the city the benefit and the experience he acquires during the time of his service. He is better qualified, if he is a good man, to serve the second year than the first, and the third year than the first and second; but as there should be a reasonable limit, three years seems to be a reasonable limit. Changing him every six months, or every three months perhaps, or even every year, while the others remain permanently, makes necessarily the engineering part of the board of very little experience and very little influence. My principal confidence in that board is that it has in it a man educated in Army traditions, highly educated by his graduation at the Military Academy which we maintain, raised on account of having a permanent life employment and a provision after he arrives at a certain age above the temptations that assail men who are not so fortunately situated. These circumstances will give peculiar value to his services in the board; and it seems to me that he ought not to be changed, so that when he shall have acquired a little knowledge of his duties and be prepared to discharge them well somebody is to go to school and learn them and be again discharged himself. If my friend means that by the officer being detailed from time to time, I desire to suggest for his consideration what I have said.

Come like shadows, so depart—

Mr. EDMUNDS. There would be great force in that—I agree with every word my honorable friend has said—but we have the responsible duty of the President of the United States in selecting this engineer from time to time, if you have it that way, to select a good man; and the considerations occurring to the mind of the Chief Magistrate of the United States will be exactly those that my friend has so well stated. He will consider that it ought not to be constantly going and coming; and practically when now for nearly ten years we have provided for all the public buildings and grounds in this District being administered by an officer of the Corps of Engineers, to be detailed from time to time by the Chief of Engineers who is made the responsible man who details from time to time, we have found by experience that the detailing authority never makes a change unless there is a clear and a good reason for it.

Then, it appears to me that we ought to have sufficient confidence in the Chief Magistrate of the United States in this permanent arrangement that in selecting an officer of the Corps of Engineers he is to have the discretion of relieving him from duty, just as he has in his duty in the engineers in sending him to be something else whenever, in his judgment, the interest of the District requires it. That is my impression. While I agree to all my friend has said as to A or to B, I think that the best end is subserved by making the Chief Magistrate responsible all the time for a good engineer in the place.

Mr. BLAINE. If this provision stands, I ask the Senator from Vermont would it not conflict with the power of the Commander-in-Chief over the Army officers?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, but this bill provides for a regulation of the Army, and the Constitution declares that Congress may make rules and regulations for the government of the Army.

Mr. BLAINE. Do you pass this to regulate the Army?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a special regulation as to a particular officer.

Mr. BLAINE. It takes an officer out of the command of the President.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, but he is to perform a particular duty under the command of the President, just as in the case of the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask my friend in charge of the bill one question, whether for any dereliction of duty this officer would be tried under the rules and regulations for the government of the Army, or would he be liable to impeachment?

Mr. INGALLS. He would be liable to punishment under the rules and articles of war. I will say to the Senator from Maine that according to my understanding as the bill now stands the President could detail an officer of the Engineer Corps every day in the year, a separate one if there were that many, as the bill now stands, without the words proposed by the Senator from Vermont. I think they remain entirely under the control of the Commander-in-Chief.

Mr. BLAINE. If any bill provided that the President should detail an engineer officer for three years, would the construction of the bill be, in the judgment of the Senator from Vermont, that an incoming President for two years after he came in would not have the ordering of that engineer officer whenever he wanted?

Mr. INGALLS. The bill does not detail the engineer officer for three years.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And I am trying to make it more clear on that point; that is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I move to reconsider the amendment adopted just now, reducing the length of residence required of the two commissioners appointed from civil life, for the purpose of making a suggestion which I think may very likely meet the favor of both sides—the Senate was very evenly divided on this matter—and that is for the purpose of moving that one of the two persons appointed from civil life shall, as the bill now provides, have resided here three years, and limiting the provision as to residence to one of the two commissioners.

This bill recognizes two conflicting theories of the proper government of the District of Columbia; one that Washington and Georgetown are ordinary cities to be governed as ordinary cities are in relation to their municipal affairs, by their own people; the other recognizes the fact that this is a Federal city. The framers of the Constitution did not contemplate probably the assembling of any considerable number of persons here, except persons who came here to discharge public functions. It was expected that it would be in the main a city of citizens from all parts of the United States, and that the legislative duty reserved to Congress over it, the exclusive legislation, would be like that reserved in the same clause for forts and arsenals, in the main—a provision for the Government and ordering of public property alone; and that is still by far the largest part of the administrative function in this District.

Now there is one consideration which, it seems, to me, is specially important, and that is that the police administration of this District should always be in the hands of the Government of the United States, that Congress never should sit here in times of political excitement such as may exist in the future, subject to any danger from mobs, the means of protection against which and prevention of which are not entirely within the control of the National Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And exerted under its authority.

Mr. HOAR. And exerted under its authority. I do not myself see the force of those arguments in dealing with the proper form of government for the people of the District of Columbia, which are based on the principle spoken of by the chairman of the committee as local self-government. The Constitution intended and required that the whole legislative authority over this District, all the making of its laws, should be exercised by the nation at large; and it is a solecism in government to separate from the power which makes the laws the power that administers them. I do not speak of course of the distribution between two branches of government, but the power which makes should and must always administer laws, because the power to which the administration of laws is left can unmake the law which it has the discretion or the obligation to administer.

It seems to me that if the interest of the District of Columbia is considered, of the old residents, their wish, so far as to require that one of the two commissioners appointed from civil life shall be an old resident here of at least three years, the President of the United States ought to be permitted to select for this important official function any citizen from the entire country of whose special fitness for the duty he may be satisfied. The exercise of the duties of these commissioners of course is very important to the large public property here. It is very inportant to the interests of the people. Perhaps a majority of the persons in Washington at any one time come here for purposes so temporary in their character that they do not acquire a residence here, but are still permanent. Take the matter of the schools. It is quite possible that the permanent residents of the District of Columbia may have very different views—they have certainly in the recent past had very different views—in regard to the necessity for the full and generous education of children than those who have come here from other parts of the country for purposes more temporary.

I think that the most reasonable disposition of this question would be to leave the President of the United States at liberty to select the most efficient and competent man he can find from anywhere within the limits of the United States for one of these two civil commissioners, and leave the bill as the Senate committee reported it as to the other; and if this vote shall be reconsidered I will make that motion.

Mr. INGALLS. If the object of the Senator from Massachusetts is what he has disclosed—and of course of that I have no doubt—I should hope that the motion to reconsider would not prevail. I am very clear that if conditions of citizenship are to be imposed they should bear upon these officers equally. It appears to me it would be very difficult and perhaps very invidious to attempt to discriminate in regard to length of residence between the two civil commissioners who are to be appointed by the President. I can see nothing to be gained by it; and while I should have preferred to have had the period of three years retained, yet, the Senate having determined otherwise, I am content with the period of one year. I am very positive in my convictions that a different period should not be prescribed for these two officers.

Mr. HOAR. Instead of making the motion to reconsider at present and insisting upon that and then having the other motion afterward, I will make the motion to amend as I have indicated when the bill comes into the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider is withdrawn. The question is on the section.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas if there is any objection to making these first appointments for two and three years instead of the times named.

Mr. INGALLS. That arrangement is made in a subsequent portion of the bill. The period of their first official term is prescribed so that they will go out of office at different times hereafter, which I suppose is what the Senator desires to accomplish.

Mr. HOWE. No. I see that it is the purpose of the bill to have them leave office at different times; but this section, if I recollect aright, provides that the first appointees shall hold for one and two years instead of two and three, which it seems to me they might just as well.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator submit any motion on the subject?

Mr. HOWE. No, I was simply calling the attention of the Senator to it.

Mr. INGALLS. I think practically it might be as well to leave the bill as it is, from the fact that it will require some little period of time to secure an absolutely satisfactory adjustment of these governmental relations; and, inasmuch as the period of three years will occur at different intervals after the first commissioners' terms have expired, I think there will be no difficulty in the way suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BAYARD. Is there any amendment pending before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is none pending. The question is on the second section as amended.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I offer the following amendment:

In line 28, after the words "per annum," insert the words "and shall, before entering upon the duties of the office, each give bond in the sum of $50,000, with surety as required by existing law.

The amendment explains itself. Under existing law, as I believe, each commissioner gives a bond in the sum of $50,000. This confines the bond to the two commissioners from civil life and does not extend it to the officer of the Army.

I believe that the duties and responsibilities of the commissioners under the present bill are about the same in substance as they are under the law as it now stands. If there was reason for requiring surety before, it continues to exist.

Mr. DORSEY. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that he change the amendment from line 28 to after the word "years" at the end of line 33, where it once was, and my recollection is that the omission of that proposition of the Senator from Delaware is a clerical mistake. I think it was the intention of the committee to report that with the bill, and I hope now it will be adopted.

Mr. BAYARD. I would suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that placing this amendment at the end of line 33 would cause the officer of engineers to give bond as well as the other two. That was not my intention. The officer of engineers is appointed I may say ex officio as a member of a branch of the public service giving him a special qualification for a portion of the duties of this office. He is also subject to the articles of war which the other two are not; and I do not know that any officers in the Army, except those who are made paymasters and the like, are called upon to give bonds of this character for the execution of the duties of a civil office. If it be considered proper to embrace the officer of the Army in this requisition for a bond by the committee, I have no objection; but it was my impression that the two civilians were the only commissioners who should be required to give bond.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, it is evident that the commissioner selected from the Army ought not to be required to give a bond, and the committee decided that it was not necessary for either of the commissioners appointed from civil life to enter into such an obligation or undertaking. They are not the custodians of any of the funds of the District. This bill provides that all moneys collected by taxation and all appropriated by Congress shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States. It can only be drawn from the Treasury by warrants approved by an officer of the United States Government; and inasmuch as there is no possible chance of any defalcation or corrupt use of the public funds the committee thought it was an unnecessary obligation to impose upon these commissioners. I would also suggest to the Senator from Delaware that his amendment is very indefinite in its terms, inasmuch as it does not prescribe the conditions upon which the bond is to be given and for what purposes it is to be filed.

Mr. BAYARD. It refers to "existing law" as prescribing the conditions. They shall each give bond with sureties as required by existing law. "Existing law" creates this office of commissioner and prescribes a bond to be given with sureties to be approved in a certain amount.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator then alludes to laws now in force.

Mr. BAYARD. Yes sir.

Mr. INGALLS. Inasmuch as the duties of these commissioners are defined by this bill and all parts of laws inconsistent with it are repealed, it is evidently incongruous. If the Senator can describe what obligations these commissioners are under in connection with this bill making it necessary for them to enter into that obligation, I should be glad to have him do so.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator a question by way of answer, as is allowed in some parts of the country?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. Are not the duties of commissioners under this proposed law the same substantially as they are under the laws now in force?

Mr. INGALLS. Substantially of course they are, because the objects to be attained in both are the same.

Mr. BAYARD. Would not a bond conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duty under the present bill apply with equal force under the present bill as under the law now in force?

Mr. INGALLS. It would if there were any pecuniary obligations that these commissioners were to enter into that would render it desirable for any person to have a remedy against them for such an undertaking.

Mr. BUTLER. Allow me to suggest is not money to be drawn out on the warrants of these commissioners or a majority of them?

Mr. INGALLS. But before it is drawn out on their warrant it must be audited by an officer of the United States Treasury, so that they are completely hedged about and restricted in every particular.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, there is some executive business which ought to be transacted, and I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish the Senator from Maine would allow us to go on with this bill until five o'clock. Important financial measures are pending, and will be urged on the attention of the Senate. We shall be obliged to have a conference with the House on this bill, and we might finish it this afternoon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You cannot do it.

Mr. INGALLS. We might try.

Mr. HAMLIN. I submit the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 22, 1878.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. S. DOMER, D. D., St. Paul's English Lutheran church, Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate requested the return by the House of the bill (H. R. No. 4245) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint James Shields, of Missouri, a brigadier-general in the United States Army, on the retired list.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has the names of a number of gentlemen who desire to be recognized for the purpose of presenting matters for consideration by the House. Unless the regular order is demanded, the Chair will recognize those gentlemen in the order in which they have made their requests.

Mr. WADDELL. I demand the regular order, and give notice that I will do so every morning until we have a morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This will not interfere with the morning hour.

UNITED STATES COURTS AT QUINCY, ILLINOIS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk, and to ask for its immediate consideration. It is a bill providing for holding terms of the United States court for the southern district of Illinois at the city of Quincy, the largest city in the State except Chicago. The people of Quincy and the neighborhood have now to go from one hundred and eighty to two hundred miles for the purposes of attending court. The Committee on the Judiciary are unanimously in favor of the bill.

Mr. BREWER. Does the bill provide for any additional expenditures?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. It does not.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4947) being a substitute for House bill No. 3781, providing for the holding of additional terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States for the southern district of Illinois, and for other purposes, was received and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The first section of the bill provides that in addition to the terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States for the southern district of Illinois now required by law, terms of said courts shall hereafter be held at the city of Quincy, in said district, commencing on the first Mondays of April and November of each year.

The second section provides that the clerks of said district and circuit courts of the United States (by and with the approval of their respective courts) and the marshal thereof shall be required to appoint such deputies as may be necessary for the efficient performance of their duties at the city of Quincy.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PARDONS BY THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. BEEBE. I ask unanimous consent to submit for the consideration of the House at this time the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested to communicate the names of all persons pardoned for crime and released from imprisonment or from the payment of fines or from other penalties by direction of the President of the United States, from the 4th day of March, 1877, to the 20th day of May, 1878; the offenses for which each person receiving said pardon or remission of fine or other penalty was indicted, sentenced, or held liable; the term of imprisonment; the amount of fine or other penalty for which each of said persons was sentenced or held liable; the portion of such term of imprisonment, amount of fine, or other penalty actually served, paid, or suffered by each of said persons, together with copies of all papers relating to the granting of such pardon and remission of fines or other penalties.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution at this time?

Mr. BUTLER. I would suggest that the words "respectfully requested" be stricken out and the word "directed" inserted in lieu thereof. The House "directs" the subordinate officers of the Government and "requests" the President.

Mr. BEEBE. I have no objection, and will modify the resolution as suggested.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. If this resolution is to be considered at this time it should be couched in the usual form; that is, "if not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. BEEBE. I will modify the resolution as suggested.

The resolution, as modified, was then adopted.

Mr. BEEBE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BUTLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4948) providing for two additional justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

LOCATION OF LAND WITH MILITARY WARRANTS.

Mr. SAPP. I ask unanimous consent to report back, with an amendment, from the Committee on Public Lands, the bill (H. R. No. 4239) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes, and that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

There being no objection, the bill was received and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask unanimous consent that House bill No. 4247, to retire the circulating notes of the national banks, and for other purposes, be reprinted for the use of the House, the first print having been exhausted.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

PACIFIC RAILROAD COMMISSION.

Mr. CHALMERS. I ask unanimous consent to offer for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That House bill No. 4399 entitled "A bill to establish a Pacific Railroad commission" be made the special order for Tuesday, May 28, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of.

Mr. BURCHARD and others objected.

SOLDIERS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I introduced on last Monday a bill (H. R. No. 4909) extending the provisions of the act of March 9, 1878, to certain soldiers of the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I ask that the reference may be changed and the bill referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

CAROLINE M. BARNARD.

Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4949) for the relief of Caroline M. Barnard, legal heir of Colonel A. C. W. Fanning, deceased, United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

REAL ESTATE TITLES IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HUNTON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4950) to quiet title to real estate in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS ON THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. A bill relating to grasshopper sufferers has been passed by the Senate and is now upon the Speaker's table. Unless it be passed by this House immediately it will do no good, as the spring is now far advanced. It contains but one section; and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be taken from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage.

The bill (S. No. 1021) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands was read. It provides that it shall be lawful for homestead settlers on the public lands whose crops were destroyed or seriously injured by grasshoppers in the year 1876, who left their land in that year, if no other settlement shall have been made thereon by, or right or interest therein accrued to, any other person, to return to the land at any time within three months from and after the passage of this act; and upon the return of such settlers to such land, such absence therefrom shall in no wise affect the original settlements or homestead rights, but such settlers shall be allowed to resume and perfect their settlement as if no such absence had occurred. But proof of such destruction or injury of crops, absence and return of such settlers, is to be made in such manner as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may prescribe.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read twice, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BEACON-LIGHT IN CHINCOTEAGUE BAY, VIRGINIA.

Mr. KENNA. A memorial of citizens of Virginia asking for the establishment of a light in Chincoteague Bay, Virginia, was referred to the Committee on Commerce. That committee have agreed on a bill for the establishment of a beacon in lieu of a light. I ask unanimous consent to report this bill from the Committee on Commerce, with the accompanying papers, for reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ATKINS. There is no law authorizing the establishment of a beacon, is there?

Mr. KENNA. There is not; but it has been the universal practice, I believe, to refer cases of this sort to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ATKINS. The appropriation will be liable to a point of order if reported to the House.

Mr. EDEN. I suppose the reference of the bill is not to be considered as an instruction to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. KENNA. I hope there will be no objection, for the reason that this has been the universal practice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The title of the bill will be read, after which there will be opportunity for objection.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill to establish a day-beacon on Killick Shoals, in Chincoteague Bay, Virginia.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4952) was reported, read a first and second time, referred, with accompanying papers, to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

EDWARD BROWN BOUTWELL.

Mr. SHELLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4951) for the relief of Edward Brown Boutwell, late commander in the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

He also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to transmit to the House of Representatives the papers on file in his office touching the resignation and application for restoration to office of Edward Brown Boutwell, late commander in the Navy, including the letter of President Lincoln to the Secretary of the Navy requesting the latter to place said Boutwell on duty, the several letters of said Boutwell to the Secretary of the Navy requesting that he be placed on duty, and the Secretary's letter declining the services of said Boutwell.

Mr. SHELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRAUDS UPON POSTAL REVENUE.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. By request, I ask consent to offer the following resolution for reference to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads is hereby instructed to investigate the practicability of preventing frauds upon the postal-revenue by the use of the national chemical stamp and to report thereon to this House at the earliest practicable moment by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I object.

CARLOS BUTTERFIELD.

Mr. BRIDGES. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with amendments, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 168) requiring the Secretary of State to furnish information to this House in reference to the claim of Carlos Butterfield against the Government of Denmark.

The joint resolution was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "Congress" and in lieu thereof insert the words "this House."

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Does that come from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes, sir; it is from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It is merely a resolution calling for papers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to its consideration?

Mr. BRIDGES. We propose to make it a simple House resolution instead of a joint resolution. The committee did not deem it necessary to adopt a joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order to proceed in this form. The word "joint" is not stricken from the title, and the enacting clause of the joint resolution still remains. It is not in the power of a committee to report back a simple resolution as a substitute for a joint resolution. If the gentleman will modify it so as to make it a simple resolution the Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. BRIDGES. I withdraw the report for the present.

PRESIDENTIAL TITLE.

Mr. HARRISON. I rise to a question of privilege, and offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's table.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas a select committee of this House has been appointed to inquire into certain frauds alleged to have been committed in Florida and Louisiana in November, 1876, in connection with returns of votes for electors for President and Vice-President; and

Whereas it is charged that frauds of a like character were committed at the same time in the States of Oregon and South Carolina——

Mr. PAGE. That is not a question of privilege, and the Chair has been imposed upon.

Mr. FRANKLIN. Let the resolution be read. It cannot be decided whether it is a question of privilege or not until it has been read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the resolution.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading, as follows:

Therefore,

Be it resolved, That said committee be, and hereby is, empowered to inquire into the same, if in its opinion testimony thereon of a substantial character shall be presented to the committee; and

Be it further resolved, That, the Senate and House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress having counted the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, and it having been thereupon declared that Rutherford B. Hayes had received the highest number of said votes for President of the United States and William A. Wheeler had received the highest number of said votes for Vice-President of the United States, it is not now in the power of Congress, nor is it the purpose of this House through said investigation, to annul or to attempt to annul the action of the Forty-fourth Congress in the premises.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state in regard to the question of privilege that, when the resolutions originally authorizing this investigation were brought before the House and decided by the Speaker to be a question of privilege, an appeal was taken from that decision by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] and on a vote by yeas and nays the House sustained the decision of the Chair. This resolution appertains to the same subject, and the Chair is constrained to regard it as a question of privilege, at least to the extent of submitting it to the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. We did not hear the resolution; let it be again read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question to the House whether it is a question of privilege or not.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I move to lay it on the table.

Mr. HARRISON. Let me say, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will not recognize any gentleman until order is restored in the Hall.

Mr. ATKINS. Debate is not in order.

Mr. FINLEY. I call for a division of the question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot recognize any gentleman until order is restored. The Chair will submit the question to the House whether the resolution involves a question of privilege.

Mr. BANNING. Let it be again read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In regard to the question of privilege the Chair will direct the Clerk to read an extract from the Manual.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever the Speaker is of the opinion a question of privilege is involved in a proposition he must entertain it in preference to any other business; and when a proposition is submitted which relates to the privileges of the House it is his first duty to entertain it at least to the extent of submitting the question to the House as to whether or not it presents a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This question is properly submitted to the House without debate.

Mr. COX, of New York. Is it in order to move to refer it to the special committee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to refer or to lie upon the table would properly come in after the House decided whether the resolution is before the committee or not.

Mr. COX, of New York. I propose to make that motion at the proper time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman immediately after the question has been decided by the House.

Mr. HARRISON. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 29.

Mr. HARRISON. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Is the resolution divisible?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will be determined when the resolution is before the House.

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays, and call for tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will order tellers.

Mr. HARRISON. I renew my call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FORT. I desire to have the ruling of Speaker RANDALL upon the question of privilege read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is a question of order of business, and must be determined without debate; otherwise there would be no end to it, and the House would never be able to establish an order of business. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] renews his demand for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 42; a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I ask the Chair, is not this question divisible? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will not undertake to decide whether the question is divisible or not until it comes before the House.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 71, nays 50, not voting 170; as follows:

Mr. CRAVENS. My colleague from Arkansas, Mr. SLEMONS, is paired with Mr. FREEMAN, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BEEBE. I am paired with my colleague from New York, Mr. BUNDY. If he were present, I would vote against the resolution being entertained as a matter of privilege, because it makes no charge against any officer of the United States.

Mr. KENNA. My colleague from West Virginia, Mr. MARTIN, is paired with Mr. PUGH, of New Jersey.

Mr. HENRY. My colleague from Maryland, Mr. ROBERTS, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. O'NEILL. My colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. SMITH, is paired with Mr. RICE, of Ohio, on this question.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. My colleague, Mr. AIKEN, is paired with Mr. WARD, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. LANDERS. I am paired with Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. If I had been at liberty to vote, I would have voted "ay." I do not know how Mr. ROBINSON would have voted.

Mr. CALKINS. I am paired with the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ACKLEN.] If he were present, I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. CLYMER. How would you vote if you were here? [Laughter.]

Mr. OVERTON. On all political questions I am paired with my colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. COLLINS.

Mr. SAMPSON. I am paired with Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I am paired with Mr. HOUSE, of Tennessee, on all questions to-day.

Mr. HAYES. On all political questions I am paired with Mr. DEAN, of Massachusetts.

Mr. WATSON. I am paired with Mr. CLARKE, of Kentucky.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. As the original proposition to investigate was held a privileged question, I vote "ay."

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. My colleague, Mr. STEPHENS, is paired with Mr. DWIGHT, of New York.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to announce that I am paired with my colleague from Missouri, Mr. METCALFE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On the question whether the House will entertain the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] as a question of privilege, the yeas are 71 and the nays are 50.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. No quorum has voted.

Mr. HARRISON. Not being disposed to obstruct the business of the House and a quorum not having voted, I withdraw the resolution.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WADDELL. I demand the regular order.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to proceed with the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. WILSON. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. WILSON,] who stated that he rises to a question of privilege.

ALLEGED FRAUDS IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas a select committee of this House has heretofore been appointed to investigate alleged frauds in connection with the electoral vote of the States of Louisiana and Florida; Now, therefore,

Be it resolved, That such committee be, and they are hereby, authorized to investigate frauds touching the election aforesaid in any other State, provided they have probable cause to believe that such frauds existed.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to refer the resolution to the special committee that is charged with investigating the alleged frauds in the electoral count in the presidential election, and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. ALDRICH. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know whether this is a question of privilege?

Mr. MILLS. I make the point of order that this is not a question of privilege at all.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to give the fullest and freest chance for investigation, and I wish that the resolution be put upon its passage now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to understand whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] demanded the previous question upon the motion for reference?

Mr. COX, of New York. I did; the committee can report the resolution to-morrow.

Mr. MILLS. I ask if this resolution, as a question of privilege, can be introduced now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman did not make that point until after the motion to refer had been made and the previous question had been demanded.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will amend my motion so as to provide that the committee shall have leave to report back the resolution at any time, so that we may have the judgment of the committee as to the propriety of its adoption.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If objection be made that cannot be done.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. COX, of New York. Very well; I do not care about it.

The question was put upon seconding the previous question, and on a division there were—ayes 86, noes 64.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered, being upon the motion of Mr. COX, of New York, to refer the resolution to the select committee to investigate the alleged frauds in the presidential election.

The question was put; and upon a division there were—ayes 87, noes 82.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COX, of New York. Would it be in order for me, at this moment——[Cries of "Regular order!"] Would it be in order for me to withdraw the motion to refer?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Not after the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not after the previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move, then, to reconsider the vote ordering the main question.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I make the point of order that it is too late to make a motion to reconsider when the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion to reconsider is a motion that may be made at any time.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will withdraw the motion to reconsider, as gentlemen on the other side will not accommodate me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will then call the roll upon the motion to refer.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Let us vote against the reference.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 89, nays 116; not voting 86; as follows:

COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. HUNTON, Mr. BLACKBURN, and Mr. HENDEE as the conferees on the part of the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3969) regulating the appointment of justices of the peace and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

IMPEACHMENT OF O. B. BRADFORD.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a privileged question, and submit a report from the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department. The report is somewhat lengthy and I will not ask to have it read at this time, but I will ask that it be printed for the use of the House and also printed in the RECORD.

In order to show the privileged nature of the report I will state that it presents ten articles of impeachment against O. B. Bradford, late consular judge and vice-consul-general at Shanghai, China, together with a resolution recommending that he be impeached at the bar of the Senate for high crimes and misdemeanors while in office.

The report concludes with the statement that, as two members of the committee, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BUNDY,] entertain grave doubts as to whether Mr. Bradford was such an officer as under the Constitution of the United States was liable to impeachment, therefore the committee recommend that the whole subject be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report thereon without unnecessary delay.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon referring the report to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HALE. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. SPRINGER. This being a privileged question the committee can report upon it at any time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will be determined when the occasion arises. It is always understood that when a reference is made by unanimous consent the matter so referred shall not be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now ask that the report be printed for the use of the House, and also in the RECORD.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Expenditures in the State Department would respectfully report that on the 26th day of February, 1878, they commenced the investigation of the matters referred to in the memorial of John C. Myers, consul-general at Shanghai, China, relating to the affairs of the consulate-general at Shanghai, China.

Your committee have not completed the investigation in regard to the charges preferred against Hon. George F. Seward, late consul-general at Shanghai, now minister of the United States at Peking, China. But your committee—having completed the investigation of the charges against Oliver B Bradford, late vice-consul-general at Shanghai, China; late deputy consul-general at Shanghai, China; late consular clerk of the consular court at Shanghai, China, and now holding the office of postal agent of the United States at Shanghai, China, and also the office of consular clerk of the United States, assigned at Shanghai, China—return to the House of Representatives the testimony which they have taken in regard thereto, and recommend that the said Oliver B. Bradford be, by the House of Representatives, impeached at the bar of the Senate, of high crimes and misdemeanors while in office, upon the following articles, namely:

ARTICLE I.

That the said Oliver B. Bradford, between the 1st day of January, A. D. 1872, and the 1st day of January, A. D. 1874, then being vice-consul-general of the United States at Shanghai, China, deputy consul-general of the United States at Shanghai, China, clerk of the consular court of the United States at Shanghai, China, postal agent of the United States at Shanghai, China, and consular clerk of the United States, assigned to Shanghai, China, became interested in the construction of a certain railroad from Woosung to Shanghai, within the Empire of China, and used his official influence to promote the construction thereof, in violation of the treaties then and now existing between the United States and the Empire of China, and in violation of the acts of Congress in that behalf, and contrary to the wishes of the people of China, and regardless of the protest of the authorities of the Empire of China within the district where the said railroad was located.

ARTICLE II.

That the said Oliver B. Bradford, between the 1st day of January, A. D. 1872, and the 1st day of January, A. D. 1874, then holding the several offices mentioned in article 1, did, at Shanghai, China, form a scheme for the construction of a railroad from Woosung to Shanghai, in the Empire of China, for the sake of pecuniary profit, and then and there well knowing that the authorities of the Empire of China, in the district where the said contemplated railroad was to be located, were opposed to the construction of the said road, then and there conspired with E. Iverson, J. J. Miller, A. A. Hayes, and C. P. Blethen to deceive the said authorities of the Empire of China, and fraudulently pretend to obtain license from said authorities to build said railroad, and in pursuance of said conspiracy the said Oliver B. Bradford and the said E. Iverson, J. J. Miller, A. A. Hayes, and C. B. Blethen, formed a copartnership under the name and style of the "Woosung and Shanghai Road Company," and under said name and style, then and there, obtained permission from the said authorities of the Empire of China to purchase land for the purpose of constructing a common road between said Woosung and said Shanghai; and that the said Oliver B. Bradford and the said E. Iverson, J. J. Miller, A. A. Hayes, and C. P. Blethen, having obtained such permission from said authorities of the Empire of China, did, then and there, purchase land for a pretended common roadway between said Woosung and said Shanghai; and after purchasing said land the said Oliver B. Bradford, with the said E. Iverson, J. J. Miller, A. A. Hayes, and C. P. Blethen, then and there, in fraud of the rights of the Empire of China, and against the wishes of the people of China, and against the protest of said authorities of the Empire of China, did, then and there, commence the construction and building of a railroad on the land so fraudulently obtained, against the wishes of the people of China, as the said Oliver B. Bradford then and there well knew, and against the protest of the authorities of the Empire of China in the district where the said road was located, as the said Oliver B. Bradford then and there well knew, in violation of the treaties then existing between the United States and the Empire of China, and against the acts of Congress in that behalf; and that the said Oliver B. Bradford did, then and there, use the influence of his said official position to accomplish said fraudulent scheme by imposition as aforesaid upon the said authorities of the Empire of China.

ARTICLE III.

That the said Oliver B. Bradford, between the 1st day of January, A. D. 1872, and the 1st day of October, A. D. 1877, holding all the several offices mentioned in article 1, at Shanghai, in the Empire of China, was guilty of injustice, tyranny, and extortion in his official capacity upon citizens of the United States, in this, to wit:

First specification: That the said Oliver B. Bradford, in the month of January, A. D. 1873, holding the several offices at Shanghai, China, as stated in article 1, but not exercising any judicial function, nor acting judicially, the Hon. George F. Seward, who then and there was consul-general of the United States at Shanghai, China, being then and there at his post and on duty, the said Oliver B. Bradford was applied to by one G. W. Cantrell in regard to a matter of business at the consulate of the United States at the said Shanghai, and that the said Oliver B. Bradford, then and there taking offense at something said by the said G. W. Cantrell to the said Oliver B. Bradford, did pretend to punish said G. W. Cantrell as for contempt of his, the said Oliver B. Bradford's, official dignity, and did cause the said Cantrell to be imprisoned therefor in the United States jail at Shanghai for the period of twenty-four hours; and at the end of said imprisonment the said Oliver B. Bradford ordered the said Cantrell to be brought before him, the said Oliver B. Bradford, at the consulate of the United States at the said Shanghai, and the said Cantrell being then and there brought into the presence of the said Oliver B. Bradford, the said Oliver B. Bradford then and there demanded of said Cantrell to know whether he, the said Cantrell, would apologize for what had taken place the day before; and on his refusal so to do the said Oliver B. Bradford ordered the said Cantrell to be again imprisoned for the period of twenty-four hours in the United States jail at Shanghai, and he was so imprisoned, which said imprisonment was without authority of law.

Second specification: That the said Oliver B. Bradford, while holding the several offices mentioned in article 1, at Shanghai, China, while driving in a carriage, in the city of Shanghai, in China, his carriage came in collision with a carriage driven by one Passmore, a citizen of the United States, by which collision the carriage of the said Oliver B. Bradford was injured; and thereupon the said Oliver B. Bradford then and there caused the said Passmore to be arrested and brought before him, the said Oliver B. Bradford, without authority of law; and the said Oliver B. Bradford did then and there, without trial, order the said Passmore to be imprisoned until he should pay the amount of damages named by the said Bradford; and the said Passmore was thereupon imprisoned in jail for many days, until a friend of the said Passmore paid to the said Oliver B. Bradford the sum demanded by him, the said Bradford, for the alleged injury to his carriage; which imprisonment was without any authority of law.

Third specification: That the said Oliver B. Bradford, while holding the said offices mentioned in article 1, at Shanghai, China, did then and there, without legal process or lawful authority, cause one Anderson, an American citizen, to be arrested upon complaint verbally made that he owed certain sums of money, and caused him to be imprisoned in jail for many days, to compel him to pay the same, but the said Anderson, being unable to make payment, was finally liberated by order of the said Oliver B. Bradford, and by the said Oliver B. Bradford then and there banished from China.

Fourth specification: That the said Oliver B. Bradford, while holding the several offices mentioned in article 1, at said Shanghai, China, and while exercising the functions of his office of clerk of the consular court of the United States at Shanghai, China, did, under color of his office, then and there extort from divers persons, residents of Shanghai, large sums of money, to wit, $1,000, under pretense of legal fees, but in excess of fees allowed by law, and in violation of the laws of the United States.

Fifth specification: That the said Oliver B. Bradford, while holding the several offices mentioned in article 1, at Shanghai, China, and exercising the functions of consul-general at Shanghai, China, entertaining ill-will toward one Theodore W. Eckfeldt, a citizen of the United States, and hearing a report that the said Eckfeldt had been guilty of embezzlement from a firm of merchants in whose employ he, the said Eckfeldt, had been, at Shanghai aforesaid, solicited said firm to commence criminal proceedings against said Eckfeldt, by writing said firm a letter, substantially as follows:

UNITED STATES CONSULATE-GENERAL,
Shanghai, March 11, 1876.

Messrs. RUSSELL & CO., Shanghai, China:

SIRS: It is a matter of current report that Theodore W. Eckfeldt, an American citizen, late in your employ, has so conducted himself while in your service in respect of moneys intrusted to him by you as agents or otherwise as to render him criminally liable.

It is my duty to, and I do hereby, point out to you that if upon examination you have found that he has done wrong, a prosecution should be promptly entered against him.

In the event of your not making such prosecution or giving to me information upon which such may be made, you are assuming a grave responsibility.

Asking your serious attention to this matter, I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

O. B. BRADFORD,
Vice-Consul-General.

And thereupon the said firm, solicited as aforesaid, made complaint to said Oliver B. Bradford, acting as consul-general of the United States as aforesaid, and acting judicially; and thereupon the said Oliver B. Bradford, acting as consul-general, and acting judicially, ordered a warrant to be issued for the arrest of the said Eckfeldt, to be brought before the consular court of the United States at Shanghai, over which the said Oliver B. Bradford was then presiding as judge; and thereupon the said Eckfeldt was arrested and brought before said court; and thereupon the said Oliver B. Bradford, while acting judicially as aforesaid, then and there employed an attorney to prosecute the said Eckfeldt in said court, agreeing to pay the said attorney $850 for his services in that behalf; that afterward and during the time aforesaid, the said Eckfeldt was brought to trial in said court presided over by the said Oliver B. Bradford, was found guilty, and was sentenced by the said Oliver B. Bradford to be imprisoned for the term of three years, no fine or costs being imposed; and the said Eckfeldt was thereupon imprisoned in the jail of the United States at the said Shanghai under said sentence. That the said Oliver B. Bradford was then and there also deputy postal agent of the United States at said Shanghai, and as such had exclusive charge of the United States mails, conveying letters to and from residents of Shanghai, and that while he, the said Oliver B. Bradford, was in such control of said mails, a letter was received at the United States post-office at said Shanghai, addressed to said Eckfeldt, and containing a draft for the payment of several thousand dollars, while the said Eckfeldt was in jail under said sentence, and thereupon the said Oliver B. Bradford, being postal agent as aforesaid, then and there seized the said letter and refused to deliver it to said Eckfeldt, except for the purpose of permitting said Eckfeldt to open said letter and indorse said draft, which the said Eckfeldt then and there did in the presence of said Oliver B. Bradford, and then and there the said Eckfeldt, by said Oliver B. Bradford's order, redelivered said letter and said draft to said Oliver B. Bradford, and thereupon the said Oliver B. Bradford then and there collected the amount of money for which said draft was drawn, and from said moneys paid to the said attorney, retained by said Oliver B. Bradford to prosecute said Eckfeldt, about $850, and the said Oliver B. Bradford then and there retained from said money $100 for his own pretended fees as clerk of said court, and $100 for pretended fees of the marshal of the United States at said Shanghai, and thereupon then and there delivered the balance of said money to the said mercantile firm; that the sum of money which the said Eckfeldt was convicted of embezzling was about the sum of $100, and that the balance of money which the said Oliver B. Bradford delivered to said firm amounted to several thousand dollars; leaving the said Eckfeldt in prison and destitute, all of which proceedings in regard to said draft and the disposition of the moneys collected by the said Oliver B. Bradford thereon were without authority of law or pretense of judicial order, and were in violation of the laws of the United States.

ARTICLE IV.

That the said Oliver B. Bradford, in the year A. D. 1876, while holding the several offices named in article 1, at Shanghai, China, and exercising the functions of deputy postal agent of the United States at said Shanghai, unlawfully took from the post-office of the United States at said Shanghia and opened and secreted and embezzled a letter which had been received at the said post-office at Shanghai, postage prepaid, from one William Myers, written and mailed at San Francisco, in the State of California, and addressed to John C. Myers, Shanghai, China, with the design thereby to obstruct the correspondence and pry into the business and secrets of the said William Myers and the said John C. Myers.

ARTICLE V.

That the said Oliver B. Bradford, in the year A. D. 1877, while holding the several offices named in article 1, at Shanghai, China, and exercising the functions of deputy postal agent of the United States at said Shanghai, did then and there unlawfully take from and out of the aforesaid United States post-office at said Shanghai a letter which had been deposited in the said post-office, postage prepaid, by one D. J. McGowan, addressed to General William Myers, San Francisco, California, United States of America, and deposited in said post-office for the purpose of being conveyed by the United States mail from said Shanghai to San Francisco, California; and did then and there unlawfully open said letter with intent and design then and there to obstruct the correspondence of the aforesaid D. J. McGowan and General William Myers; and with design to pry into the business and secrets of the aforesaid McGowan and Myers.

ARTICLE VI.

That the said Oliver B. Bradford, in the year A. D. 1876, while acting as consul-general of the United States at Shanghai, China, and while holding all the offices mentioned in article 1, at Shanghai, China, and while one Phœnix was jailer of the United States at said Shanghai, and in charge of the United States jail at said Shanghai, and at a compensation agreed upon at $80 a month, the said Oliver B. Bradjord, acting as consul-general as aforesaid, paid to the said Phœnix the sum of $60 for one month's salary of the said Phœnix as jailer aforesaid, and refused to pay him the said $80 agreed compensation, but did then and there require the said Phœnix to execute and deliver to him, and the said Phœnix did then and there execute and deliver to him, the said Oliver B. Bradford, a false receipt and voucher for the sum of $80 for said month's compensation, and that the said Oliver B. Bradford then and there transmitted said false voucher to the Treasury Department of the United States for allowance and payment, and the same was thereafter in the said Treasury Department allowed and paid at the false sum of $80.

ARTICLE VII.

That the said Oliver B. Bradford, from January 1, A. D. 1876, to and including the 30th day of June, A. D. 1876, holding all the offices mentioned in article 1, and acting as consul-general of the United States at Shanghai, China, and as such being a disbursing officer of the United States, charged with the receipt and disbursement of the moneys of the United States at said Shanghai, did defraud the United States in the manner following, to wit:

That all the moneys received by said Oliver B. Bradford, at said Shanghai, as such officer, on account of the United States, were received in silver coin, commonly known as Mexican dollars; that said silver coin at said Shanghai at that time commanded a premium over American gold and over the currency of the United States; that the said Oliver B. Bradford, as such disbursing officer, uniformly paid out the same silver coins he had received, but that the said Oliver B. Bradford, then and there intending to defraud the United States, made out his quarterly statements of account of said receipts and disbursements showing that he had received the money in currency of the United States and had therewith purchased gold, and with said gold had purchased said silver coin, charging the difference upon both said premiums to the United States as disbursed by him; whereas in truth and in fact the said Oliver B. Bradford never did purchase any gold, and never did receive any currency as such officer on account of the United States.

ARTICLE VIII.

That the said Oliver B. Bradford, from April 1, A. D. 1877, to September 13, A. D. 1877, holding all the offices mentioned in article 1, and acting as consul-general of the United States at Shanghai, China, and as such being a disbursing officer of the United States charged with the receipt and disbursement of the moneys of the United States at said Shanghai, did defraud the United States in the manner following, to wit:

That all the moneys received by said Oliver B. Bradford, at said Shanghai, as such officer, on account of the United States, were received in silver coin commonly known as Mexican dollars.

That said silver coin, at said Shanghai, at that time, commanded a premium over American gold and over the currency of the United States; that the said Oliver B. Bradford, as such disbursing officer, uniformly paid out the same silver coin he had received, but that the said Oliver B Bradford, then and there intending to defraud the United States, made out his quarterly statements of account of said receipts and disbursements showing that he had received the moneys in currency of the United States and had therewith purchased gold, and with said gold had purchased said silver coin, charging the difference upon both said premiums to the United States as disbursed by him, whereas in truth and in fact the said Oliver B. Bradford never did purchase any gold and never did receive any currency, as such officer, on account of the United States.

ARTICLE IX.

That the said Oliver B Bradford, between the 1st day of January, A. D. 1876, and the 13th day of September, A. D. 1877, holding all the offices mentioned in article 1, and being a disbursing officer of the United States charged with the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursements of the moneys of the United States of America, did then and there receive a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of $2,000, the said sum of money being then and there the money and property of the United States of America aforesaid, and having then and there come to the hands of the aforesaid Oliver B. Bradford by reason and by virtue of his, the said Oliver B. Bradford's, office as aforesaid, he, the said Oliver B. Bradford, did then and there wickedly, unlawfully, and feloniously convert to his own use, and did then and there embezzle the said sum of money belonging, as aforesaid, to the said United States of America.

ARTICLE X.

That the said Oliver B. Bradford, on the 30th day of July, A. D. 1877, holding all the offices mentioned in article 1, at Shanghai, China, and by reason and virtue of the aforesaid offices being intrusted with and having in his possession $2,561.50 belonging to the United States, being public moneys received by him by virtue of the offices held by him as aforesaid, did then and there unlawfully deposit the said sum to his own private credit in a bank at Shanghai, China, called the Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris, contrary to the laws of the United States in that behalf.

Therefore your committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution by the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That Oliver B. Bradford, now consular clerk of the United States, assigned to Shanghai, China, and postal agent of the United States at Shanghai, China, and late vice-consul-general of the United States at Shanghai, China, and late deputy consul-general of the United States at Shanghai, China, and late clerk of the consular court of the United States at Shanghai, China, be impeached by the House of Representatives at the bar of the Senate for high crimes and misdemeanors while in office.

While your committee are all of the opinion that the facts as set forth in the foregoing articles of impeachment are fully sustained by the evidence herewith submitted, a minority of the committee, consisting of Messrs. DUNNELL and BUNDY, entertain grave doubts as to whether Mr. Bradford is such an officer as is liable under the Constitution to impeachment; and therefore your committee respectfully recommend that the whole subject be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report thereon without unreasonable delay.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I now move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. WADDELL. I desire to raise the question of consideration between the Army appropriation bill and the morning hour.

Mr. SINGLETON. I desire to submit a privileged report.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] to allow me to submit a report from the select committee on the election of President and Vice-President, to be printed and recommitted. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am willing to yield to gentlemen to present reports, provided the House will consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded by several members. Should the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] be agreed to, it will suspend all other orders of the House. The regular order for this morning is the further consideration of the bill in charge of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr REAGAN,] known as the interstate commerce bill, which is pending as unfinished business. The morning hour cannot be reached until those two matters have been disposed of.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WADDELL] states that he desires to raise the question of consideration between the Army appropriation bill and the morning hour. The Chair will state to the gentleman and to the House that the morning hour can be reached only by refusing to go into Committee of the Whole on the Army appropriation bill, and also by refusing to take up the unfinished business. Then the morning hour will be the regular order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to have some order of the House in reference to general debate upon the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. EDEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EDEN. Last night the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] entered a motion to reconsider the order by which all general debate upon the Army appropriation bill was to cease at the close of last night's session. That motion to reconsider has not yet been disposed of. I call attention to it now for the reason that I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] ought to have an hour before general debate is closed. If that can be agreed to by unanimous consent, then the matter can be settled in that way.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I was just going to call up the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to reconsider is one of the highest privilege, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] can call it up now.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Very well; I will call up the motion, and desire to state——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the question before the House, which is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered that all general debate in Committee of the Whole on the Army appropriation bill should be closed with the session of yesterday evening.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Is not this motion debatable? I understood it to be so.

Several MEMBERS. No! No!

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. The only purpose I had in entering this motion to reconsider was to correct a misapprehension which the discussion commenced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] had possibly created, and also for the purpose of giving the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] an opportunity to be heard in answer to an onslaught which was made upon his State. I think it very wise and proper for these reasons that the motion should be adopted. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I would like to state in a very few words the reasons why the reconsideration should be agreed to. Yesterday after the debate was limited, the few gentleman who spoke had their time extended by the courtesy of the House, which was all right and proper; but the result was that others, and I among them, were ruled out. I therefore call attention of the House to this undesigned discourtesy shown to some by an excess of courtesy to others.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope my colleague on the committee [Mr. HEWITT, of New York] will allow the gentleman from Texas to occupy an hour, and will then go on with the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I do not propose to make any opposition to this request, but it is my duty to try to get on with the public business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] to reconsider.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. On that motion I presume I have the floor. I do not desire to detain public business——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has indulged some discussion upon this question, but it is quite out of order. He now desires to submit the question.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Is it not in order to state the reasons why the motion should pass?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order to debate a motion to reconsider a question which was not itself debatable.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, to reconsider the vote by which general debate on the Army appropriation bill had been closed, the motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. HEWITT, of New York, that all general debate on the Army appropriation bill terminate with the session of last evening.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I now modify my motion so as to allow one hour more for general debate.

Mr. DUNNELL. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] a day or two ago announced to the House that he would not make the motion to close debate so long as any gentleman desired to speak.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am bound to say that I think the gentleman misunderstood the scope of my remark. I have, however, tried to give the widest possible latitude for debate. But if we are to adjourn on the 10th of June there must be an end of this general debate. I simply want to get on with the public business.

Mr. DUNNELL. The gentleman knows that we do not expect to adjourn on the 10th of June.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Do I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] to be in favor of adjourning on the 10th of June?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am.

The motion of Mr. HEWITT, of New York, that when the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole all general debate on the Army appropriation bill be limited to one hour, was agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that he had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 3546) to change the name of the steamboat D. A. McDonald to Silver Wave.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. HEWITT, of New York, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 116, noes 50.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, obtained the floor and yielded forty-five minutes to Mr. SCHLEICHER.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Mr. Chairman, before entering upon the discussion of the question before the committee, I wish to return thanks for the courtesy of my friends who have given me the opportunity of saying something upon a matter which is of peculiar interest to my district. I would not obtrude myself upon the House if this were a question of general importance only; for I know that it has been considered and well considered by two committees of the House. But this is a matter that concerns my constituents and my district more than any other portion of these United States. And for the reason indicated I wish to say that in this discussion I shall confine myself strictly to that portion of the subject which does concern my district. I will not discuss the organization of the Army except so far as it may be incidental to my main subject. I will not discuss the pay of the officers. Yesterday when I interrupted the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] and said the committee was not very generous in its appropriations, I had no reference, as he seemed to believe from his answer, to want of generosity to officers or any one else, but merely to want of generosity toward the people upon the frontier. That was the only matter I then referred to. In respect to all these matters properly in charge of the Committee on Appropriations, I will have nothing to say. I do not pretend to advance my judgment against that of the Committee on Appropriations, or Military Affairs, or of those whose special business it has been to inform themselves better concerning the organization of the Army or its pay.

Nor, Mr. Chairman, do I wish to enter into the discussion of the necessity of using the Army to suppress riots in the States, or its use at all in the States as a police force. I will pass over all those questions which have been so ably debated, and will call attention only to that portion of this particular use of the Army in which the people whom I represent, living upon the frontier, may be very materially interested. For, sir, I am perfectly satisfied, and every gentleman who knows the circumstances is satisfied, that if during the next summer the same scenes should occur in the large cities and along the lines of the railroads, and the same demand should be made upon the President of the United States for the Army to aid in suppressing riots and domestic violence he will call the troops away from the frontier, where they are now a protection to the frontier settlements against the Indians and incursions from other countries. There is no doubt in my mind that he will do it and do it to any extent necessary. It is not optional with the President of the United States when called upon under proper circumstances whether to aid or to refuse to aid the authorities of a State in suppressing riots and domestic violence. The Constitution, if I am not mistaken, is mandatory and provides he shall when called upon assist the States in suppressing domestic violence. Consequently I call attention of the committee to the fact, that no matter what may be the necessity for the protection of the Indian frontier if the same scenes should be re-enacted which were witnessed last summer; if the same necessity should occur, and there is no reason why it should not, I am satisfied the frontier will be denuded of troops, now placed there for the protection of our people, in order that they may be sent to the States to suppress riots and put down domestic violence, and for this reason, among others, the reduction of the Army just now is ill-advised and dangerous for the interests of my people.

And in connection with this, Mr. Chairman, I will call the attention of the committee to another fact: that in some matters the arguments of the gentlemen who represent the Committee on Appropriations, and the provisions of the bill do not exactly accord. If I understand the statements of those gentlemen correctly, they all admit the frontier ought to be protected, and that no troops, or as few as possible, ought to remain in garrison or in the forts. If I correctly understand the provisions of the bill the only branch of the service, however, never needed upon the frontier is the only one not reduced, and that is the artillery force. The infantry and cavalry are both reduced to the extent of the proposed reduction of five thousand men. The artillery force, on the contrary, which is not used upon the frontier, but is stationed where gentlemen argue it is useless, I repeat has not been reduced.

Mr. Chairman, about six months ago, during the extra session, when this same question was presented to the House, the delegation from Texas stated its conviction that the force of twenty-five thousand men as the maximum of the Army was not sufficient—that at least it was not too much for the needs of the frontiers of our country alone.

I wish the House to understand that we make no special claims in reference to this subject. We do not claim in Texas any protection for our frontier at the expense of other portions of this immense frontier needing protection. We would neither as Representatives on this floor nor would our people at home accept any such proposition. We only ask that protection for our own frontier, as a portion of the whole, and we ask and direct it equally for the frontier settlers of our whole country, wherever they may be.

And right here I may be permitted to call the attention of members to a peculiarity in our Government which I think is often forgotten and does not receive sufficient consideration. My friends around me who represent Territories and the interests of the people living upon other frontiers than those of Texas, have no vote in this House. Those Territories like the District of Columbia, are thrown as an additional duty upon those who do have votes upon this floor and represent other congressional districts. The interests of those Territories are to be looked after and protected as far as possible whenever it comes to voting by those gentlemen upon this floor having votes who represent other districts and have no frontier requiring protection on the part of our Army. Their votes and their national spirit is all that the people of the Territories must rely on. It is very true that the Delegates representing the Territories have seats in the House, and we hear eloquent appeals from them to Congress for the defense of their people, and no one doubts that if they had votes the votes of Dakota and Montana and Idaho and every other Territory with an Indian frontier would be given against any reduction of the Army which protects them. I appeal to gentlemen, therefore, who may think that they only represent their especial districts, to remember that to them those Territories are to look for adequate protection for their frontiers. The Delegates are here to speak only in behalf of those whom they represent, and it devolves upon you to give them what they cannot secure by their own votes. Therefore it seems to me that you should not overlook it. We from Texas at least do not forget it, and make common cause with them as a matter of national duty although they cannot help us in voting for our interests.

Since the time we made these statements here that the Army with a maximum of 25,000 enlisted men was not too large, that it was inadequate really for the full protection of the entire frontier, only six or seven months have passed and the circumstances have not changed; if they have changed they have partly changed for the worse. At the time we spoke here we had partial peace in Texas. I have lived there, Mr. Chairman, now these thirty-one years, since 1847, and I can say that last year came nearer being a year of entire peace on the Texas frontier than any I have seen or heard of.

It is very well for gentlemen here to talk about these things and tell their anecdotes sneering at the demands of Texas or of those frontier people and to say that they claim protection merely to get soldiers there and make contracts with the Government. Why, sir, on the Mexican frontier there is no one to make contracts with the Government. Our people raise sheep there. They do not raise crops to sell to the Government. It is a pastoral country now and is only used in that way and all the advantage the people there can have from the Government is the advantage of protection and no more. They do not speculate on it.

But the gentleman from New York who manages this bill has declared that there is no danger of any trouble on the frontier; that there is no danger of any trouble from the Mexican border. He says the Indians have promised, if I understood him correctly, to keep the peace.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman misunderstood me. I made no such statement.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I understood the gentleman to make that statement in substance.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I said I thought there was but little probability of any Indian war this summer from the reports of the generals. I said nothing as to promises.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. It has been said by somebody.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Not by me.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. And I will tell this House that the danger is not in the promising or in the failure to promise peace; but the danger is in the presence of those people. Every one who has the slightest experience of the Indians and of our troublesome neighbors on the Rio Grande knows that their promises go for nothing. Those who live far remote from there, those who have "no friend nor brother there," can rely upon these promises and feel perfectly certain that everything is lovely. But, sir, it is different with those who know that the lives of their children, of their friends, and of their families are dependent upon the promises of an Indian or a Mexican raider.

The gentleman from New York—I refer to him frequently because he manages the bill and has made the strong argument on that side—said that the present state of the Army—I do not remember the exact words but will give the substance of them—was the one that he took for a norm; that it was sufficient, as we had universal peace; and he takes the present strength of the Army, the actual strength in the field, as he presents it, as the maximum of the Army in the future, and proposes to cut below that.

The whole argument is based on the fact that we have peace, that there is no danger threatening, and that the protection of our border is ample and complete. I now desire to lay before the House a few pictures of the peace we do have. I desire the Clerk to read the account of an occurrence in El Paso. But before the Clerk begins to read I will state something about the geography of that country. My district extends from the mouth of the Rio Grande for over one thousand miles along the Rio Grande to the border of New Mexico; and these frontier troubles are all in my district. I therefore believe I am called upon to direct the attention of the House to them. El Paso is a city on the Mexican side. The American forts on our side have been occupied for twenty years and more; there are two posts upon the American side, Fort Bliss, around which a settlement called Franklin has been built; below are the villages of Isleta and San Elizarrio, where the scene occurred a description of which I send to the desk. Fort Quitman is somewhat lower down.

Now, I will state a fact to gentlemen, which will show them the necessity of a permanent military force on that frontier if we are to have any lasting peace at all. More than twenty years, while we had disturbances all along the lower portion of the Rio Grande, there never was a disturbance at El Paso. All was quiet and friendly, and a lively and friendly business intercourse existed between the American settlements and the Mexican settlements. Last summer General Ord, finding his army too small to protect the river below where the constant invasions took place, removed the garrison from Fort Bliss and Fort Quitman, and left the American settlements without protection, not dreaming of any danger. No sooner was the army removed than troubles commenced between the Mexican and the American population, which ended in the scenes a description of which I desire to have read; and these troubles have since continued to such an extent that I have had several letters from friends, from reliable gentlemen, stating that just so soon as the troops who have been sent there since the troubles are removed the American settlers have to break up and leave the country; that the people would have to leave American soil, where they have lived twenty or twenty-five years.

The Clerk will please read what I have marked. It is the statement of an eye-witness, a Mexican citizen of Texas, and is from the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

During three days that the rangers were besieged I was surrounded by the mob. I witnessed all their acts, heard all their talk. Charles E. Ellis was the first to fall. He was a noble gentleman, a kind friend of the people, had lived with them and befriended them for many years, and had no idea they would harm him. When Howard came to town with the rangers, and the crowd began to gather at Leon Granillo's house, Mr. Ellis went there to talk and reason with them. He was saying, "What does this mean, boys, (muchachos!) Don't act foolishly; let me advise you for your own good," and other remarks to the same effect, when Leon Granillo cried out, "Ahora es tiempo!" (Now is the time.) Then Eutemio Chaves rode up on horseback and threw a lasso over Ellis and started on a run, dragging the unfortunate man. After he had dragged him some distance he then got down and cut his throat, and the body was thrown to the coyotes. It has been charged that Miguel Juarez had something to do with the killing of Ellis. This is not true. Juarez was not in El Paso County at the time. He was in New Mexico.

After the murder of Ellis the attack on the rangers continued for three days. During this period I frequently heard the leaders of the mob discussing the situation; they told their followers that "their friends in Franklin had assured them that the United States troops would not interfere." And these same leaders, and especially Chico Barela, stated that they were simply obeying orders from their superiors at El Paso. I do not pretend at this time to give an opinion as to the truth or falsity of these statements; the matter is now being investigated, and when the truth is brought to light, the truth and the whole truth will be published to the world. As I before stated, I was with the mob. I could not escape, for I was closely watched. They called me a traitor to my race for not joining them and threatened to take my life, which was only saved by the exertions of some of my blood relations, who, to the disgrace of our name, were acting with the mob, and who have by their lawless acts stained the name of an honorable family with infamy. I heard their consultations and know all about the trap they set to catch Howard, Atkinson, and McBride. They sent in a flag of truce; the besieged men were guaranteed safety and kind treatment if they surrendered. Mr. Atkinson gave up to the leaders of the mob $11,000 in specie, currency, and drafts, on the condition that they would permit him, Howard, McBride, and all the rangers to depart without molestation.

Chico Barela swore by the holy cross that he would faithfully keep his part of the agreement. Mr. Atkinson believed him, and said, "Well, you have received a better price for us than we would bring if sold at public auction." It is said by some of the mob that Chico Barela intended to keep his word, and that he sent a messenger across the river to the Cura Borajo, informing him of what had been done and received this answer: "Shoot all the Gringos and I will absolve you."

Howard was first taken out. The entire mob was formed in a regiment, about six hundred strong, and marched with Howard at the head to the place of execution. He walked erectly, with his hands behind him. When he reached the place of execution the command was given, "Halt!" Howard instantly stopped, and turning, faced the mob; they were drawn out in a line. All was silent as death. Desiderio Apodaca, with a firing party of eight men, came up and took positions about ten feet from the doomed man, who stood quietly watching the proceedings. When all was ready Howard spoke. He could not speak Spanish very fluently, but enough to make himself understood. He said: "You are now about to execute three men;" then, baring his breast, he gave the word, "Fire!" Then the firing party fired, and Howard fell and kicked and squirmed on the ground; then Jesus Telles ran up to the body, and raising a machete (large knife) in both hands, struck at the body; the blow fell, but Howard turned and the machete fell on Telles's feet, cutting off two of his toes. The body was then hacked and mutilated, after which it was dragged to an old well and thrown in.

Then Atkinson and McBride were brought out and stood on the spot where Howard had fallen. McBride said nothing, but appeared to be very melancholy. (triste) Atkinson spoke in excellent Spanish. After stating the pledges they had made to release the party and the oath they had taken to perform their promises, he asked them if they still intended to violate their solemn pledges. The crowd shouted "Acabemos!" (Finish them.) "Then," said Atkinson, "there is no remedy!" "No! no!" shouted the crowd. "Then let me die with honor," he said; "I will give the word." He then took off his coat and vest, opened his shirt so as to uncover his breast, looked at the party of eight men who stood with their guns ready to fire, and said in a cool manner, "When I give the word, fire at my heart. Fire!" As he gave the word five bullets struck him in the belly; he staggered, but recovered himself and shouted, "Mas arriba, cabrones!" (Higher up, you —— ——.) Two shots were then fired and he fell, but still was not dead. He motioned toward his head, and Desiderio Apodaca, the commander of the firing party, put a pistol to his head and finished him. McBride was instantly killed. The bodies were then dragged off.

I witnessed the above scene, I heard the remarks I have given, and hold myself responsible for the truth of this account. When this occurred there stood in the line of insurgents over three hundred men from the opposite side of the river, and I can furnish the names of most of them if required.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. This occurred on the 10th of December last, when this House was in session.

Mr. Chairman, four men, four Americans, were murdered as here described on American soil by a Mexican mob, three hundred of whom, as he says, came from the other side, and the others from this side. These four Americans murdered on American soil were my constituents; they were my friends. I have received their votes to come here, and I believe I have a right, as their fate is ignored, to at least bring it somewhat to the attention of the country. There has been a time when the murder of four American citizens, murdered as these men were murdered, marched to their graves and shot, would not have been ignored by the American people.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the origin of the difficulty in Presidio did not grow out of a quarrel as to the use of waters from a salt spring, and if Howard did not in that difficulty kill Candez? Was it not a family feud?

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I do not care how it commenced, three men besides Howard were murdered. But I say again that the murder of four Americans, four heroes, two of whom had been brave Union soldiers and two of whom had been brave confederate soldiers, by five hundred men marching before them and executing them upon American soil, is a thing that perhaps deserves a little notice, even in these times; and, even if the difficulty did originate as the gentleman says, I will say that all these troubles originate about something; sometimes it is salt springs, sometimes it is stealing of cattle, sometimes it is stealing of horses, and sometimes it is personal quarrels; but the result is the same. I have mentioned this to show that immediately after the troops were removed this horrible event occurred, and it has gone to such length, as I have before stated, that I have letters from friends and constituents telling me that every American has to leave that country when the military force is removed. So much about the peace prevailing at El Paso.

From El Paso down to San Antonio there is a waste country, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] referred to the fact that reports had come up that about half a dozen mail-riders had been killed; that it had just come in time to be used on this appropriation bill. Sir, the facts are as reported. They have been killed there. It may be a matter to sneer at; I do not know, but the fact remains, and it is a fact stated in the papers and confirmed by every private letter I have received, and by letters received from friends who are as credible and as much entitled to credit and belief as the gentleman from Wisconsin himself. I have received letters from officers and others. I will read a few dispatches from San Antonio:

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS, April 26, 1878.

A dispatch received to-day at headquarters from Fort Stockton at 10 a. m. says:

"Twelve Indians were reported to have been seen near Lower Escondido, twenty miles from here, at dark yesterday. At the suggestion of the guide I shall not send him out until evening.

"VAN VALSEAH,
"Commanding."

Another Indian raid is reported on the northwest frontier. Raiders were seen to-day near Escondido, between Forts Concho and Stockton, where the mail-rider was killed last week. These Indians are from the Fort Stanton reservation.

SAN ANTONIO, April 29, 1878.

The following dispatch has been received in this city from Fort Stockton:

"Walker's train has just arrived from Fort Davis. He reports being attacked by Indians near Barilla Springs yesterday, the 28th. He says the mountains, all the way from Fort Davis to the mouth of Dog Cañon, are full of Indians. They followed his train all last night.

"The mail-rider from Fort Davis failed to arrive last night, and a party having been sent out this morning to search for him found his body, riddled by bullets, only a few miles out. This makes the sixth person killed by Indians between Barilla Springs and Fort Davis within the last ten days."

A man from Del Norte says the Indians in the Limpia Mountains are from Mexico, and are Mescalero Apaches. There have been more Indian depredations in this section of late than has been known for ten years before.

There was no danger there, the Indians are all getting civilized at the reservations. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] assures us that they are all peaceable, and have laid down their arms and live on their reservations. But occasionally they go down from their reservations and make a little trip into Texas and murder and rob our people, and that is the peace that the gentleman from Illinois represents to us so pleasantly.

I read now another dispatch, dated April 23, 1878, from Tilden, and this is near the lower Rio Grande:

TILDEN, TEXAS, April 23, 1878.

Yesterday the news reached here that on last Thursday a band of about twenty-seven Indians, supposed to be partly composed of Mexicans, raided through the southern portion of La Salle County, entering that county a few miles to the south of Fort Ewell, in the neighborhood of which place they killed several persons, pursued their course down the south side of the Nueces to the ranch of Mr. W. H. Steele, a sheep-man who lives in the southeast corner of La Salle County.

Mr. Steele was at the time away from home. Two of his little boys who were assisting in herding sheep were killed, one of the shepherds was wounded, and a couple of others reported killed. A brother of Mr. Steele, seeing a squad of horsemen and thinking them cow-boys, rode toward them. He discovered his mistake too late to save himself.

From here they directed their course through the northwestern portion of Duval County to Brown's ranch, meeting on their route two young men named Moore, one of whom they killed, the other escaping wounded.

At Brown's ranch they killed some shepherds, making in all about ten or twelve persons killed on their trail from near Fort Ewell to this ranch.

The raiders probably turned from here toward the Rio Grande, having in their possession about one hundred horses. This raid will be a serious drawback to the settling up of that unsurpassed grazing region, but it is the legitimate fruit of the weak and pusillanimous spirit that of late years has seized hold of our Government, exposing her citizens abroad to insult and disgrace; at home, on her border, to robbery and loss of life.

FORT EWELL, April 23, 1878.

The raiders after leaving the Chaves ranch went to L. M. T. Pope's, and made away with all of his saddle-horses. The Pope ranch is twelve miles below Fort Ewell.

From Pope's the marauders went to Steele's and killed his brother, a young man about twenty-three years of age, wounded one of his shepherds, and either killed or carried off two little white boys by the name of Taylor, aged ten and twelve years. The boys were employed by Steele.

From Steele's the raiders went to Jellet's and killed his boss man.

A gentleman living in Laredo writes the following letter in reference to his experience in the late raids to a San Antonio friend:

"I had also a very narrow escape in coming from the ranch. A party of Indians crossed on this side and were but a short distance in my rear, tracking the buggy-wheels, but they happened to meet two men in the road and killed them. This gave me time to escape, although at the same time I was ignorant of their being on my track. I had just arrived at the ranch when they reached there only a few yards behind me, when they met and killed another man.

KILLING AND STEALING.

"They are still killing and stealing on this side of the river. They were reported to be about forty in number, well armed and mounted on good horses. They were eight days in the country and no troops nor any person would follow them, all being afraid and not certain of the number of Indians, who were divided into several parties."

I may fitly conclude these extracts with the following telegram:

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS, April 26, 1878.

The Indians who captured horses and murdered fifteen persons last week near Laredo have made good their escape.

What we may look for in the future is truly expressed in the following extract:

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS, April 30, 1878.

The Express of this city contains the following from Fort Ewell:

"This raid has been a great injury to this county, as we all know enough of these raiders to know that they will come again next full moon, and will keep coming as long as they can make it pay."

But the gentleman from New York says that it is peace, and it is upon the fact that this is peace that the proposed reduction of the Army is based.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word there?

Mr. SCHLEICHER. The gentleman from New York has limited my time. When the House was willing to give me an hour he cut me down to forty-five minutes, and I will not allow him to interrupt me.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am sorry you take so narrow a view of it.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. You took the narrow view first and I only follow.

The moon has only changed once since that occurred and the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] who has been the chairman of an investigating committee charged with the investigation of this very matter, only last night informed the House that for eighteen months there had been entire peace on the lower Rio Grande, and this was on the lower Rio Grande. He was not aware of these facts; they escaped his notice. I know that if all these gentlemen knew the state of things there it would not last. But the worst part of the fate of our people is that they are murdered, robbed, and impoverished, and that they are ignored, and not even the poor boon of pity is granted to them by the gentlemen, their countrymen, here who make laws for them and whose duty it is to protect them. Here let me read a letter from Mr. Steele, whose ranch was attacked and whose brother was murdered. He wrote to General Ord the letter which I now read:

FIFTEEN MILES BELOW FORT EWELL,
Palo Alto, Nueces River, April 17, 1878.

DEAR SIR: Pardon me for addressing you, but my urgent case forces me to you direct.

The Indians from Mexico have visited here to-day, and killed my brother and all my pastors, (shepherds;) and two boys, one twelve, the other seven years of age, have been carried off into captivity; good, gentle, white boys, and the poor mother is distracted. Will you, kind sir, use your great influence to notify all Mexican officials about these poor children; their description is as follows: The eldest boy, about twelve years of age, has dark brown hair, and blue eyes, tall and slim, and is called George Taylor; the younger one is about seven years old, is stout and fair-haired, with hazel eyes, and is named Dick Taylor, wore black jean pants, and white duck jacket.

I wish to offer a reward of $500 for the recovery of the children.

I have written to J. A. Maurice and implored his good offices with you to aid me in this request, but dreading he is out of town, I take the liberty of writing you direct. Please, for the sake of a poor, broken-hearted woman, and in the interest of our common humanity, to do what you can with those Mexican officials so that the children may be restored to their mother.

Yours, very humbly,

W. H. STEELE.

General ORD, San Antonio.

From the following it appears, however, that the raiders did not long encumber themselves with the children, and that the unfortunate mother succeeded in saving her other children only by her own courage:

About one mile from the ranch, two boys—sons of Mrs. Taylor, aged respectively seven and eleven years—had also been killed and mutilated. Mrs. Taylor saw the Indians kill Steele, and placing three of her little children on a plank she waded the Nueces, pushing them before her, and escaped.

Gentlemen of this committee, these people have a claim upon you; they are Americans; they are of your own flesh and blood. It may be that they have kinsmen here upon this floor. George Taylor and Dick Taylor, the two little boys, were found murdered. The dark brown hair of George Taylor and the fair hair of little Dick Taylor was torn from their bloody skulls and carried away to decorate the belts of the "peaceful Indians" which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] spoke about yesterday. The stark and pale little bodies of both were mutilated; the blue eyes of the one and the hazel eyes of the other were closed in death. Their mother, in her frantic despair, and, striving to save the other little ones, took the three small children and placing them on a plank pushed them across the river at the risk of her life, and succeeded in saving them and herself.

This is a picture of the "piping times of peace" which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] holds up for your admiration. This is the full protection which he says is afforded by your Army, which is larger than is necessary, and which he proposes to reduce by five thousand men.

Mr. Chairman, I have been accused sometimes of being a filibuster, of wanting to take Mexico or a part of it. Sir, I hesitate to say it, but I must say it: God forbid that this country should ever become any larger; it is far too large now for the minds and hearts of its legislators. [Great applause.]

Mr. BRIDGES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Certainly.

Mr. BRIDGES. I desire to ask my friend from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] how many troops would be sufficient to successfully protect the frontier of Texas.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I do not know; I will come to that presently. It certainly is not in the direction of affording protection to cut down the Army five thousand men below its present standard, and that is the proposition now before this committee.

Mr. SPARKS. You mean forty-five hundred.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Well, forty-five hundred, if you please, or even ten. Sir, I would consider it a sin if I were to vote for the reduction of one man in the effective strength of the Army under any compromise whatever.

Now in regard to the great motive which influences members in this proposition to leave these people unprotected. What is the great motive for cutting down the infantry and cavalry of the Army? Not the artillery, for that is left in the towns and not reduced in this bill. What is the motive for cutting down the infantry and the cavalry of the Army? The great motive urged here is economy. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the American people are hardly ready to economize in that direction. And allow me to say that that economy is not very fairly represented to the House. It is said that we can save by this reduction $4,000,000. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS,] when speaking yesterday, stated to the House that each enlisted man cost the Government $156.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is $350.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. One hundred and fifty-six dollars, the gentleman said. Therefore the saving on five thousand enlisted men would amount to $780,000. The remaining $3,220,000 must be saved somewhere else, not in the reduction of the number of fighting men.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman will pardon me; I made no allusion whatever to that subject.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I made a note of it at the time.

Mr. SPARKS. It must have been some other gentleman; I made no reference to that subject.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Very well, is it so or not? Does an enlisted man cost the Government $156?

Mr. SPARKS. It was the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] who referred to that matter.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Then I pass the compliment over to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. They cost $1,000 each.

Mr. BANNING. Will the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] allow me——

Mr. SCHLEICHER. If time is allowed me I will yield to everybody; I cannot yield when I am limited.

Mr. SPARKS. When the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] through mistake referred to me as making a remark which I never made, I thought it due to the gentleman himself that I should correct him.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. My apology is due to the gentleman, and I make it very cheerfully.

Now I would like to notice some of the logic in, and also the sort of connection there is between, the speeches of gentlemen and the act to be performed by the bill now before the House. In the first place the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT]—I hope I am not mistaken this time—the gentleman from New York stated that our Army was a skeleton army, and that the system of a skeleton army was altogether faulty. He cited very high authority on his side; he said that the Army was, in a word, "top-heavy;" that there were too many officers and too few men. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman from Texas allow me to answer him at such length as I wish.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Not now.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If the gentleman asks a question, then I am to understand that I am to sit here and listen to a great many misrepresentations and not have an opportunity to correct them. If the gentleman wishes to question me, let him say if I am to answer him or not.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Not in my time; I cannot speak and be replied to at the same time.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Then do not ask me any questions which I am not permitted to answer.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I will ask no questions, but I will make the statement directly to the committee, [laughter,] that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] did use the argument that our Army was a skeleton army; that the experiment of such an army had been condemned by high authority, and that the Army should not be allowed to remain a skeleton army, but it should rather be made a compact army fully ready for service. He said that there were too many officers and too few men. I took down his words when he uttered them.

And what does he propose? Does he propose to strike down the officers? No; he is exceedingly lenient and generous with them. One would suppose from his argument that his proposition would be to strike down the officers and increase the number of enlisted men, or at least not to interfere with the latter. But where does he cut down? He cuts down in the first section of the bill, fixing the maximum number of enlisted men, the men who are too few according to his argument; he proposes to cut down these to the extent of five thousand. Now, my mind is not equal to the task of reconciling these two things.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] said something in reply to my remark that I thought the committee had not dealt generously with this question. I explained this morning that I meant they had not been as generous as they should be toward our people. That gentleman said repeatedly that this bill did not propose to interfere with the officers—did not turn out any officer. Consequently his argument comes to the same result: that ours is a skeleton Army with too many officers and too few men; yet the remedy proposed is to leave the officers and make the number of men still fewer.

I have, in my time, been considerably engaged in the study of mathematics, and I always thought that I had some talent in that direction; that I could understand mathematical problems. But the gentleman from New York has given me one puzzle which I have been thinking over without being able to arrive at any conclusion. He said he could prove that with an Army of twenty thousand men we would have more muskets in the field than with an Army of twenty-five thousand. [Laughter.] If the gentleman should command our forces I have no doubt he could improve the organization and get more active force than anybody else has ever done; but he does not propose any change in the present management. Those now in command are expected to remain and do the same thing they have been doing. Now, the puzzle to me is this: here are the same corps of officers, the same staff, and everything else the same; yet I am expected to believe that under precisely the same management there will be more active service, more men in the field, with an Army of twenty thousand than with an Army of twenty-five thousand! I give it up. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] stated last evening quite correctly that the troops on the Rio Grande had not been stationed where they ought to be; that the main force of raiders infested the Lower Rio Grande, while the troops were collected at Fort Clark, some hundreds of miles away. Some time ago I went to General Sherman and made this same representation to him, and he said to me in something of the same hopeful mood as the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] that there was peace, that everything was right at present, and it was a good idea to leave well enough alone.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. MILLS in the chair.) The House has limited general debate in Committee of the Whole on this bill to one hour, of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] is entitled to fifteen minutes.

Mr. ITTNER. There is universal consent, I think, that the gentleman proceed.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The order limiting debate cannot be rescinded or modified in committee.

Mr. HOOKER. It has often been done.

The CHAIRMAN. Not when the House had ordered that all general debate should close in one hour.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The remainder of this hour belongs under the assignment to me; but the gentleman from Texas has been so very courteous in referring to what I have done that I now yield to him all the time I can possibly control.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I am very much obliged to the gentleman. I have been under the necessity of referring to him in the course of my remarks, because he stands foremost as the champion of this bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I hope the gentleman from Texas will not attribute his want of comprehension of my mathematics to my fault.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. No, sir; to my own weakness. There are some things which I never could learn, among them, for instance, the game of thimble-rig or anything of that kind. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me just a moment. I hold in my hand a statement which has just been received from the Paymaster-General, showing that the actual reduction in the number of officers by this bill is four hundred and eighty-four. This answers that point. Then as to the difference between twenty-five thousand and twenty thousand men, I will say that during the last year the actual number of our Army did not exceed twenty-two thousand men; and the figuring of the Adjutant-General's Office as to the actual number of muskets with a force of twenty-two thousand men agrees exactly with the figuring of the same office as to the number of muskets with a force of twenty thousand.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. But the figuring does not protect our people. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It does not protect my people either.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] referred to the fact that the number of men in actual service has not exceeded twenty-two thousand men; and he used this as an argument to show that it is unnecessary to authorize a force of twenty-five thousand men. But I have ascertained that under our system of recruiting the maximum number authorized by law can never be reached. I will read a statement of the reason:

> The reason that the regular Army has lately been reported less in strength than the 25,000 allowed by law, is that Congress authorized 2,500 in addition to the 25,000 allowed before to be added to seven of the regiments of cavalry for the late Sioux war, with the proviso that after that war 2,500 men should be discharged from the infantry and artillery (not cavalry) to bring it down to 25,000 again. This forced an immediate discharge of that number. There was then a period of about five months for which there was no appropriation to support the Army. Recruiting was consequently stopped during that time, and the Army became considerably reduced by casualties which were unusually large during that period. Recruiting was resumed as soon as possible, and the latest returns received show about 23,400 enlisted men.
> Scattered as the Army is over such a very large extent of country, recruiting has to be conducted with great caution so as not to exceed the legal number. Hence, should the returns show a near approximation to that number, recruiting must be checked until a safe reduction is exhibited, and, meanwhile, before such returns are received and recruiting can be recommenced, a considerable number of casualties may occur. This is a condition of things which cannot be avoided while legislation leaves so little discretion to the Department in the management of military affairs.

All there is essential in this is that in practice it is impossible to keep an army up to its maximum, that you must make the allowance of a certain percentage, and in this case it seems to be two thousand. Perhaps it is too large, but whether 10 per cent. or 5 per cent., for practical reasons the Army in the field remains below the legal maximum. That will apply, then, quite as well after the Army has been reduced to twenty thousand men as to the Army at twenty-five thousand men. Consequently, by the rule of three, (and that is a part of mathematics I do understand,) just as twenty-five thousand maximum is to the actual number in the field so will twenty thousand after reduction be to the then actual number in the field, the "unknown quantity," as the gentleman from Wisconsin has said.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me come to the point as to the number of men in Texas, that is, the number of men out of the given number of soldiers ready for active service, and who can be used and counted on for defense. These two statements are combined in what I will read from the official statement made last month.

> Last month the total force in the Department of Texas was 3,749 men, of which number only 1,964 were available for duty. The balance are enumerated as follows: Escorts and men employed repairing forts, telegraph lines, and roads; sick, wounded, and missing; clerks, mechanics, cooks, bakers, hospital stewards, and nurses; prisoners under sentence; teamsters.

If the members of the Committee on Appropriations having charge also of all the other appropriation bills can point to any one of them which has come before the House, or which they propose hereafter to bring before the House, that does away with the necessity of using regularly enlisted men for the purposes specified in the extract which I have just read and provides for the employment of civilians to discharge those duties, then I should have nothing to say, except that it would not be economy. But it is not shown, and it cannot be shown, that the same necessity will not exist hereafter as it has done heretofore, and that men will not be detailed from the Army, never mind to what figure it has been reduced, for the purpose of discharging the same duties. After the reduction of the Army from 25,000 to 20,000, the reduction between the Army on paper and the Army in the field will, for the very same reason, be in the same proportion.

How small, then, Mr. Chairman, is a force of that kind for the protection of one line alone, the line of the Rio Grande, which is upward of one thousand miles long. The gentleman from Wisconsin referred in this connection to the fact that only small parties come over and it was not necessary to have five thousand or four thousand men to meet forty-five or forty raiders. He said the highest number of Indians was thirty-five.

Remember, Mr. Chairman, there is no active warfare there and that they cannot be concentrated, the enemy on one side and our troops on the other; but that, on the contrary, our troops have to scatter to the extent of the one thousand miles. No matter, then, what may be the disparity in the number of raiders, say only thirty-five Indians managed to steal through the long line of one thousand miles, guarded only by nineteen hundred men, you must remember that when they get in the settlements, although their number may seem trifling compared with the number of troops, their number ceases to be trifling when they fall upon a family of five or six, under the circumstances which I have related. Where, then, is the magnanimity in such cases to "a weak power," when forty or fifty raiders pass our frontier and suddenly come down upon a family of six or eight defenseless people who are given over to their merciless cruelties?

Yet many gentlemen here say we ought to have patience with "a weak power like Mexico." Let me ask you to remember how that patience and that magnanimity operate in practice. Put yourselves in the position of these defenseless people. I have read to you scenes which now occur under an Army with a maximum of twenty-five thousand men. Imagine what the result will be when the kindness of our friends has reduced it to twenty thousand and we shall get in Texas our proportionate share. The pictures then to come will be much worse than those I have given. To prevent the recurrence of any such scenes is what I now plead for. I implore this House to leave the Army as it is. I plead in behalf of those who send up their petition to me asking for protection. If the Army is reduced the outrages which come now singly will then come by the dozen, and you will be forced to attend to the protection of our people at last when many more victims to your economy have fallen. I plead not for those who have been murdered, for they are gone, but in behalf of those who are there who are distressed and in great fear. Their petitions come here asking me to make known the dangers of their situation to the House. What shall be the answer to their prayer? What cheer will their party friends send them; that party to which they have given their unwavering allegiance for so long a time; what return shall they have for their fidelity and steady adherence? I ask my fellow-democrats shall it be only the heartless sneers of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] and the fratricidal economy of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.] I hope not, but I leave the issue to the House.

I thank gentlemen for their kind attention.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I yield the three remaining minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING.]

Mr. BANNING. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. SCLEICHER,] who says this bill decreases the infantry and the cavalry, to the sixth section, which provides that each company of infantry must have at least seventy-three men in it. And then I would tell him and this House there is not in all our two hundred and fifty companies of infantry a single company that musters fifty men. And I would like the gentleman to explain to the House how it is, in the face of this fact, that he states this bill reduces the cavalry and the infantry. It increases those arms in sabers and bayonets and lets the artillery alone. And when this bill has passed we will have more muskets and more sabers upon the frontier of Texas and upon the western frontier than we have now, and with fourteen expensive regimental organizations less and about one-half as many companies as we have at present. We will then have regiments and companies available for military purposes instead of the skeleton organizations that we now have.

Why, sir, the largest regiment of infantry to-day in the whole United States Army only numbers three hundred and eighty men. The smallest infantry regiment under the proposed organization cannot have less under any circumstances than five hundred and eighty-nine men.

Now, Mr. Chairman, who can doubt that this will be a better, a stronger, and a more efficient organization? The arguments we have heard here against this bill have taken a wide range. One gentleman [Mr. GARFIELD] has been alarmed, like one aroused from peaceful slumber at the dead of night by the dreaded sound of the fire-bell, by a letter written by Lord Macaulay twenty-one years ago, in which he predicted the downfall of the American Republic. He has been terribly alarmed by that letter of an English lord. Mr. Chairman, if our revolutionary fathers had taken counsel of their fears they too would have been alarmed by the letters of English lords, written a hundred years ago, as the gentleman now is by Macaulay's letter; but we never would have had our free Government. But because the downfall of our Government is thus predicted by an English lord the gentleman opposes the reform proposed in this bill. His argument seems to be that we must keep up a large army at an extravagant cost to protect ourselves against ourselves. Sir, I for one have no sympathy with such an argument. I am just as much opposed to anarchy as any gentleman on this floor; but I do not believe our escape from it depends upon maintaining a large standing army in time of peace.

Another gentleman wants the Army increased and kept strong because there has been a row in Texas about the ownership of certain salt wells or lakes. These are specimens of the arguments advanced against the bill.

Now, I hope the House will take this bill fairly into consideration, and not be governed by groundless fears nor private interests. Our present force has been ample and we have in the whole Army to-day only 21,708 men, 3,400 less than the number authorized. Why have we not the whole authorized strength? Simply because the authorities do not need them. They have no use for them; none whatever. Under the organization proposed we will have 20,000 men, with cavalry and infantry amply sufficient to protect the frontier. In fact, a stronger force, because better organized, than we have to-day.

Mr. MAGINNIS addressed the Chair.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Chairman, has not the time for general debate expired?

Mr. MAGINNIS. I rose for the purpose of asking unanimous consent. I desire to say that nearly everybody has spoken on this bill except those who are especially interested in it with one exception, that being the gentlemen from Texas. All the Delegates from the Territories who have no right to vote on this at all and whose right to debate under our rules is little more than nominal, would like to say something on this bill. I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to submit a few remarks that have occurred to me in the course of the debate. I will endeavor to cover points that have not yet been touched.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. As a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I would desire also to submit some remarks on the bill.

Mr. EDEN. Unanimous consent cannot be given in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made to the request of the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Who objects?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that one gentleman who objects is the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE.]

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I do not object. What I say is that there are others who want to be heard on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for general debate on this bill by order of the House has expired; and unless the committee rises and the House extends the time, no further time can be allowed for general debate.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope the time will be extended that the Delegates may be heard through at least one of their number.

Mr. EDEN. A motion was made to reconsider the order of the House limiting debate and the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. MARSH. Cannot the time be extended by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. The House has directed that all general debate on this bill shall be closed at this time. The committee has no discretion in the matter.

Mr. ATKINS The gentleman from Montana has made a general complaint of want of sufficient time being allowed for general debate. Has the gentleman ever applied for time to the gentleman in charge of the bill?

Mr. MAGINNIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. About five minutes ago.

Mr. MAGINNIS. My name is on the Speaker's list.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I have nothing to do with the Speaker's list.

Mr. ITTNER. Can this not be done by unanimous consent of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. It can; but we are not in the House now.

Mr. ITTNER. I move that the committee rise so that the gentleman from Montana may obtain the time he desires.

Mr. EDEN. That will not help him. The time will not be extended if the committee do rise.

The question being taken on Mr. ITTNER's motion, there were—ayes 77, noes 30.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4867) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Army appropriation bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. ITTNER. Pending that, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Montana be allowed fifteen minutes.

Mr. EDEN. I object.

Mr. MILLS. I move that when the House shall again resolves itself into Committee of the Whole, all general debate on the Army appropriation bill shall be closed in thirty minutes.

Mr. EDEN. All general debate has been closed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ITTNER] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] that the only method by which they can accomplish the end they desire is by a motion to reconsider the order of the House closing debate.

Mr. EDEN The motion to reconsider has been made and has been laid on the table.

Mr. BANNING. I hope that the House will hear the gentleman from Montana by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDEN. But that consent will not be given.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ITTNER] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Montana be allowed thirty minutes.

Mr. EDEN. I object.

Mr. ITTNER. I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his objection.

Mr. EDEN. But I will not do it.

Mr. HANNA. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, and it is this: have we such a system of rules here that when this body unanimously agrees that a given thing may be done, we cannot do it?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. But there is not unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] will observe that there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. HANNA. If we vote down the motion made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] is there any way under heaven in which a man may have an opportunity to represent his constituents upon this floor? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary inquiry for the Chair to decide.

The question was put upon the motion of Mr. HEWITT, of New York; and upon a division there were—ayes 80, noes 32; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HEWITT, of New York, and Mr. ITTNER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 111, noes 33.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4867) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. All general debate having been closed by order of the House, the Clerk will read the bill by clauses for amendment.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by clauses, and read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1879, as follows:

For expenses of the commanding general's office, $2,500.

For expenses of recruiting and transportation of recruits, $50,000. And no money appropriated by this act shall be paid for recruiting the Army beyond the number of twenty thousand enlisted men, including Indian scouts and hospital-stewards; and thereafter there shall be no more than twenty thousand enlisted men in the Army at any one time, unless otherwise authorized by law: Provided, however, That not exceeding five hundred recruits in addition thereto may be kept at recruiting stations, as the necessities of the service may require. Nothing, however, in this act shall be construed to prevent enlistments for the Signal Service, which shall hereafter be maintained, as now organized and as provided by law, with a force of enlisted men not exceeding four hundred, after present terms of enlistment have expired.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I move to amend that clause by striking out the words, "twenty thousand" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "twenty-five thousand;" so as to make the number of enlisted men in the Army limited to twenty-five thousand men.

Mr. FOSTER. I did intend, Mr. Chairman, to submit some remarks upon this question, but being absent a little for the last day or two I find by the RECORD that my time has been used by two gentlemen who spoke one hour each. I desire only to say now that the Committee on Appropriations, in my judgment, under the rules of the House, rules which I condemn, have acted properly in this matter. It is probably well known to everybody by this time that if any reforms are to creep into the legislation of this House they must come from the Committee on Appropriations, for it is apparent that every other committee is utterly worthless in this respect.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has given this subject a great deal of careful attention, and I have no doubt that he desires to do what he honestly believes ought to be done, but I am very much in the same position as the gentleman from Texas in regard to the mathematical problem that has been submitted, that with twenty thousand men you can put as many muskets in the field as with twenty-five thousand men. That is utterly incomprehensible to me. I have been poring over the gentleman's figures and I cannot possibly make it out. Now, all there is of it is this: if you consolidate the regiments you get rid of the number of officers who would be mustered out, but the privates will remain. There will be just as much shortage in an army of twenty thousand as in one of twenty-five thousand. So that it is utterly incomprehensible to me that you can get as many muskets in the field with twenty thousand as you could do with twenty-five thousand men, and therefore I favor the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. THROCKMORTON.] I believe that an army of twenty-five thousand is not too large.

The gentleman from New York makes another proposition and it is this: that we ought to reduce the cost of the Army per capita to what the cost of the Army was in 1860. I do not know why he should make that proposition. I do not know why the expenses should be based upon the expenses in 1860. I do not know why he should make such a proposition as that, and then he got in a little party capital as to what this House has done in the way of reduction. I make this proposition, that it would be just as wise and just and prudent to bring the expenses of this House down to what they were in 1860 as it is to bring the expenses of the Army down to what they were per capita in 1860. The cost of running the House in 1860 was $900,000 or a little over. The bill reported by the committee, of which the gentleman and I are both members, for that purpose is over $1,800,000, and that leaves out the question of printing altogether. Why does not the gentleman from New York and my committee, who are so anxious to go back to the basis of 1860, take hold of the expenses of the House, where we have supreme control, and bring them down to the standard of 1860 per capita? The expenses of running the House now are more than 50 per cent. greater per capita than they were in 1860.

The gentleman from New York presented a table upon which he undertook to show a comparison between the cost of the maintenance of the Government in 1860 and in 1877. He placed it in 1877 at $113,562,743. I would like to know from the gentleman from New York how he made up that table. I imagine that he deducted from the total expenses of the Government for that year the interest on the public debt and the pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will take the floor, and if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] desires me to yield to him for five minutes more I will do so with pleasure, and take my chance of getting five minutes for myself afterward.

Mr. FOSTER. I thank the gentleman from New York for his courtesy. That gentleman has omitted from the gross expenditures of the Government for the year 1877 the interest on the public debt and the cost of pensions, I believe.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that my table shows what it embraces. It embraces civil and miscellaneous expenditures, and expenditures for war, Navy, and the Indians. It enumerates those items, and only those, distinctly upon its face.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman then undertakes to draw a parallel between the per capita cost of the Government in 1860 as compared with the expenditures of the Government in 1877, to the slight advantage of the year 1860. Now, if the gentleman from New York intended to be entirely accurate he should have also deducted from his expenditures for 1877 the cost of collecting the internal revenue, which is one of the incidents of the war. But for the war we would never have had an internal-revenue establishment; it costs $5,000,000 to conduct that establishment. It also costs at least $5,000,000 more for the Army and the Navy now than it did then, because of the war. It costs at least $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 for claims, for clerical services in the Pension Office, and for the various ramifications of the civil service which grew out of the war.

In addition to that we have new services now that we did not have in 1860, which cost somewhere from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000. Now, if you will make a fair comparison between the two years, I have no hesitation in saying that the expenditures of the Government to-day are less per capita than they were in 1860.

The gentleman also made another statement in which he was undoubtedly in error. He undertook to claim for the democratic party that last year it reduced the expenditures of the Government about $20,000,000. I have looked that matter over with some care, and I find that, speaking moderately, at least $5,000,000 of deficiencies will have to be deducted, thus reducing the saving, even upon his own showing, to about $14,000,000.

Then there is $4,000,000 more for which this democratic House should receive no credit whatever; that is the reduction of the interest on the public debt and the reduction under the permanent appropriations. That will leave about $10,000,000 as the actual result of this claim of reduction of expenditures, which last year was set at $30,000,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does not the gentleman fail to take into account the fact that the deficiency bills of this House, even as he states them, are not so large as they were for many years when the House was republican?

Mr. FOSTER. The deficiency bill passed by the last Congress was for $2,000,000, which deficiency arose under the republican administration; and in order to make a fair comparison that should be deducted from the amount of deficiencies for this year. Therefore, I have put the amount at $5,000,000.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] made the statement that the deficiencies were included in the statement of the annual expenditures of the Government. The gentleman is mistaken. The statement of the annual expenditures of the Government comprises only the money paid out for the year, and nothing more.

Now, for this year we are likely to have a reduction of about $8,000,000, perhaps $9,000,000. I looked the matter over carefully yesterday and my estimate is that the reductions will amount to about $9,000,000. Of that amount $3,000,000 will be in the reduction of the interest on the public debt and another million will be the reduction of administering the permanent appropriations since Secretary Sherman came into office. Therefore the result of last year's work by the House amounts to a reduction of expenditures of only about $5,000,000.

The gentleman made a further statement to which I desire to refer, and that was that we ought to reduce the expenditures of the Government by about $25,000,000. I have given some attention to this subject for four years past, and I say to the gentleman from New York that I believe it will be utterly impracticable and impossible to reduce the expenditures of the Government to that extent.

I want to say further that so far as the ordinary running expenses of the Government are concerned we have about reached our minimum. That fact has been disclosed by the action of the Committee on Appropriations this year. They have introduced a bill, which has been passed, containing $2,000,000 more appropriations than the same bill which they introduced two years ago.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. All debate upon the pending amendment I suppose has been exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It will be in order for me to strike out the last word?

The CHAIRMAN. It will.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I make that motion. There is one fact which the people of this country see and appreciate. Whereas prior to the Forty-fourth Congress they were paying taxes to the amount of $150,000,000 annually for the support of the Government, in the year after the advent of a democratic House of Representatives the taxes which they paid were $23,000,000 less, as measured by the expenses.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let me ask the gentleman from New York——

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I cannot yield when I have but five minutes. The gentleman can take his own five minutes to reply.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio may revise this matter until doomsday and still the broad fact remains the same. His only answer is that there are pending deficiencies from that year which would account for a considerable proportion of this saving.

Mr. FOSTER. What sum did the gentleman name?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Twenty-three million dollars, as shown by the official reports of the expenditures in the Treasury Department.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no; the report of the Treasury Department shows only $19,800,000.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman will find the exact figures in my speech. In round numbers the amount is $23,000,000.

Mr. FOSTER. But that you got from an almanac.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I took it from the table of receipts and expenditures in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and not from an almanac.

Mr. FOSTER. Did you not state that you took it from an almanac?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. At first I did; but then I referred to the Secretary's report and found that the almanac had copied the figures from that report.

The gentleman charges that there are deficiencies which we shall have to pay. Yes, there are deficiencies; and can the gentleman point to any year under republican administration when there have not been deficiencies which had to be made up the year afterward, and which appeared in the expenditures of that year? This was what I meant when I said that the expenditures include the deficiencies.

Now I tell the gentleman, and he knows it to be the fact, that there are to-day pending before the Committee on Appropriations applications for deficiencies going back to the year 1868, amounting to many millions of dollars, which we are required to bring into this House and charge up to the expenditures of the present fiscal year. There are many pages of these estimates submitted to the House; they can be found in the Book of Estimates. But the gentleman charges that these deficiencies are only to be carried to the democratic account, and are not to be charged up to the republican account.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think the gentleman ought to say that there are "many millions" of such applications for deficiencies.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will prove what I say; I will give an exact statement of the matter before this debate closes. There are $3,000,000 of these deficiencies in the Navy alone.

Now, the gentleman's arithmetic seems to be very accommodating, but the people understand arithmetic; they have learned it in the common schools, and when they find that $3,800,000 more than are necessary are taken out of their pockets in one year they will make the figuring for the gentleman.

I will now explain further the remark I have already made, that with a force of twenty thousand five hundred we shall have as many muskets in the field as we now have with an Army of twenty-two thousand men. The saving is made by making a reduction of four hundred and eighty-four in the number of officers, and with this reduction cutting off that great paraphernalia which waits upon officers—what might be called the trimming of the Army; and the difference is about fifteen hundred men. I repeat that our saving is effected by the better organization of the troops. If gentlemen will turn to the RECORD they will find in my speech, on page 3543, the exact figures, which I have not time now to give. By figures made up in the Paymaster's Department and furnished to the gentleman from Ohio and myself officially, the demonstration is there made that the difference under the two systems will not be two hundred muskets.

Mr. EDEN obtained the floor and said: I yield my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. MILLS. I make the point of order that this cannot be done. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] once made that point on me, and I now make it on him.

Mr. EDEN. I renew the amendment, and yield my time to the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York withdraws his pro forma amendment, which the gentleman from Illinois renews.

Mr. MILLS. The rule forbids any gentleman speaking ten minutes on the same side of any question. I ask that the rule be enforced.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York proposes now to speak on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MILLS. Then the rule means nothing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to enforce the rule as he understands it.

Mr. DUNNELL. Is there any limit to this interesting little game? Can I be recognized and yield my five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman when he addresses the Chair at the proper time.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will make the limit myself. I have taken up enough time of the House. All I want is that the House shall understand this one fact: that the effective force of the Army may be used up in a useless manner.

It is used up in a useless manner under the present organization, and when my friend from Texas offers an amendment to put five thousand men in the Army my answer is that if those five thousand are necessary then the bill which is now pending before the House will give the same number of effective muskets by adding three thousand men, but his proposition will put two thousand more men in the Army than is now or would be in the Army if up to the number of twenty-five thousand men. In other words, twenty-three thousand men under the new system will give as many muskets as twenty-five thousand men under the old system. Therefore I ask my friend from Texas and every man here who wants more muskets to vote for muskets if they will, but to vote for this new organization, which will give them the requisite number of muskets at a saving of $3,000,000. That is what we are after, and that is a saving which no Representative of the people can refuse to make unless he thinks the new organization is less perfect and less effective than the one now in existence.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Chairman, in opposing this amendment I have no disposition to war on the general features of this measure. My object is to secure enough of enlisted men to defend the country.

I wish to call the attention of my friend to this proposition. He says if the army is reduced to 20,000 men, as proposed by this bill, we will have more muskets in the field than with 25,000.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. No, sir. I say with 20,000 men we will have as many muskets in the field as we have now with the Army at 22,000, and if you add 3,000 to it we will have then on 23,000 as many muskets in the field as you would have with an army of 25,000 if it were full. That is my statement.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Here is a statement from the Adjutant-General's Office, which shows there is in the Engineer Department 198 men, and in the Ordnance Department 364 men, and on various detached services, which I will not take time to enumerate, in all amounting to 3,000 men. I ask the gentleman in all candor whether, if the Army were reduced to 20,000 enlisted men, you would not have the same detachments, and whether the only saving in the bill as proposed by the committee would not be the few men to be taken from the different regimental headquarters. That is the only saving I can see proposed under the arrangement of this bill. If you have 20,000 men you will still have 3,000 on detached service. Hence I say the proposition cannot be proved that you would have the same number of muskets in the field.

Mr. Chairman, one thing else. There was no appropriation for the Army at the last session of Congress and the recruiting service had to cease. So, then, complaint that the Army was not kept up to the standard cannot be made against the Army officers as it was not their fault but the fault of Congress itself in not making appropriation. Therefore they should not be charged with being derelict in that regard.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRIDGES rose.

Mr. EDEN. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. BRIDGES. I move to insert "fifteen thousand" instead of "twenty-five thousand."

Mr. Chairman, it has appeared in the discussion of this bill that there is diversity of sentiment in relation to what the strength of the Army of the United States should be. Some would be satisfied with twenty thousand men, some with twenty-two thousand, and others with twenty-five thousand. But, sir, one point has been omitted, and I think an important point, and that is the failure to tell us where these troops are needed. There was but one exception, the gentleman from Texas. Did it appear in the discussion that a certain number of troops was necessary for a certain point and another number for another point? No, sir.

With regard to our Texan frontier, I say if we increase the Army for the purpose of protecting the rights of the Texan people we are too generous, for we are not called upon by any principle whatever to do it; and I will tell you, Mr. Chairman and the House, why. The Mexican Government ought to be held responsible for every injury its citizens do to us, and our Government ought to give the Mexican government notice it will be held responsible for every trespass committed upon our people. If we would do that it would not be necessary to have five, six, eight, or ten thousand troops on the Texan frontier for its defense. And Mexico is bound to protect her own people and prevent them from trespassing upon our American citizens.

Again, it is said we want troops upon our Indian frontier. Why, sir, if we would treat the Indian as we ought to treat him there would be no occasion for troops there. It is because the Indian is abused, cheated, and defranded that he is impelled to seek vengeance upon the American people for injuries done him. And let me say that an Indian never forgets a favor and never forgives an injury. Treat them kindly and kind treatment will be returned. Treat them badly and bad treatment will be returned.

Another important point has been overlooked in my opinion in the discussion of this question. That is this: why should an appeal be made to the American Congress to furnish a standing army for the protection of the American people when it is the duty of every State in the Union to maintain its own militia, a militia sufficient to repel invasion if possible and to put down insurrection? And it is not the privilege of any State to call upon the Executive for aid until the executive of the State in which an insurrection occurs or violence is used can say that the troops within its borders have been unable to put down the insurrection or the violence, and it is then only the duty of the Executive of the United States to order troops to be sent to the assistance of any State that may be under such circumstances.

Now, sir, I say it is our first duty to look to our own States and to see that we have a military system there such as we ought to have before we allow applications to be made to the American Congress for money to support a standing army. We have an Army of 25,000 men. Where are those men to be distributed? If you take the thirty-eight States of the Union there will be but between six and seven hundred for each State irrespective of the Territories. Would that be sufficient, sir, to quell insurrection or repel invasion? Certainly not. Suppose, sir, that the troops are concentrated upon a certain point in Virginia and an invasion takes place in the State of Maine, how long will it take that Army to proceed to the State of Maine to repel the invasion or put down violence there?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DUNNELL. It is unfortunate I think that we cannot pass an appropriation bill for a Department of this Government without placing it upon the theory of a certain fixed determined reduction. In my judgment we ought to appropriate money according to the real wants of the Department for which we propose to appropriate. The Committee on Appropriations of this Congress has taken up the theory of the committee of the last Congress and determined if possible to make a reduction, not one based upon the merits of the different objects for which they appropriate but a reduction determined upon for the sake of making a record of economy.

Mr. ATKINS. Where did the gentleman get that information?

Mr. DUNNELL. I will not waste any of my time in answering questions.

Mr. ATKINS. I would like the gentleman to state where he got that information.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, there has not been an appropriation bill introduced into this House during this Congress without the gentleman who has had it in charge announcing to the House that it makes a reduction so much lower than the appropriation of last year. That has been the great argument: we have appropriated so many millions less than we did last year. And then the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is always bound to tell us that in the last Congress we appropriated so much less than was appropriated by the Forty-third Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I protest against this style of legislation. I think we ought to appropriate for every Department of the Government precisely what that Department requires. We are not called upon to appropriate $3,000,000 less for the Army than we appropriated last year unless we can make this reduction in the interests both of the Army and the people of the country.

No officer of the Army has admitted in the remotest degree that we ought to bring about a reduction of the Army. Every officer in the Army insists it should be 25,000 men. I have not heard the admirable speech of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MCCOOK,] a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, answered. No one has undertaken to answer that speech. No one has undertaken to say we can get along with a less number of men than are provided for in this bill.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRIDGES] who has just taken his seat does not by any means realize the magnitude of the frontier of this country. It is impossible for him to do it. And here are the Delegates from the Territory asking merely to be heard here, and they are not allowed a place in the debate on this floor, although the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] promised there should be the largest opportunity for debate. But the gentleman from Montana, who can talk on this question as well as any man on this floor, has not been allowed to tell this House why we cannot endure a reduction of the Army.

One word more, Mr. Chairman. We hear a great deal on the other side of the House about the pockets of the people. They talk a great deal about the pockets of the people and the reduction of taxation. Does not every member of the House on the other side know that there has not been one mill of reduction of taxation since they came into power? Not a mill of reduction has there been of taxation. We are paying just as much taxation now as in the worst days of republicanism—if you please to put it in that language—precisely the same amount of taxation; and the people are told that they are paying less than they paid last year and than they paid the year before, because they have got a democratic House of Representatives. They have got nothing yet. We have paid a little more of the national debt, perhaps, and nothing more, as the result of the economy by which every department of this Government has been crippled.

Mr. BRIDGES. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MILLS. I move to strike out the last word. I regret very much, Mr. Chairman, that it seems utterly impossible for this House to discuss the real question that is before it, and it has always been so especially on this Army question. The moment the question of the Army comes into this House the ring is cleared for a political encounter, a partisan encounter. The Army is to be fought by our side of the House because political capital is to be made and somebody's district is to be won by it, and the Army is to be increased on the other side of the House or used by them whenever necessary to further their ends. The legitimate purpose of the Army is left entirely unnoticed by American Representatives. The object of the creation of the Army was "to suppress insurrection and repel invasion," in the language of the Constitution. It was not to carry elections; it was not to be used for political purposes. I have no idea that such an object ever occurred to the framers of this Government as that the Army or the Navy either should enter as factors into the control of elections. What is the condition of our country? This ought to be the question which we should ask when we propose to cut down the Army. Is it unnecessary? Is it too large? What are the objects which we use an Army for? What do we need it for? Its use now is to guard our Mexican and Indian frontier. That is the whole legitimate use we have for it.

Now, we have been talking about cutting down the Army ever since I have been in Congress, for five years, and during all that time there has not been peace, solid durable peace, upon the frontier for one twenty-four hours. And the answer to the appeals made by our people who are being robbed and murdered and carried into captivity, the answer of the statesmen of this House has been, "Cut down the Army."

Mr. SOUTHARD. I would like to ask the gentleman what force has been employed upon the Texas frontier?

Mr. MILLS. Ask that question of the President of the United States, who is Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and not of me. I am here to represent my constituents and to present their appeal that you will stay the hand of violence and give them some security for the protection of life and property and person against those from Mexico who trespass within our borders, spit upon our flag, and defy our authority. We want an army to protect the people of the United States.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRIDGES] well said that your Army might be decreased if you would hold Mexico responsible and compel her to regard the boundary which divides her territory from ours. If you would do that, I would say that you might cut the Army down to fifteen thousand men, because then Mexico would cross our border at her own peril; but now she despises your pretended authority. She knows you do not mean to encounter her, not because you have not the necessary military force, but because of the money power which rules this country, that will not let you endanger the peace of the country by compelling Mexico to keep within her own territory.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLS. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DURHAM. I renew the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am one of the very few members of the House who indorse every word that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRIDGES] has said on this subject; I am one of those who, at the extra session of this Congress and in the last Congress, expressed publicly upon this floor the belief that a standing Army of fifteen thousand men was all that we required. I believe so to-day, and I believe that if we had fifteen thousand guns and the officers necessary and proper for the management of fifteen thousand guns, it would be a sufficient force to protect amply the Mexican frontier and all the Indian frontier; and I believe, as I stand here, although I intend to vote for this bill as it is, because I suppose it is about the best thing that perhaps can be accomplished during this Congress, I desire still to put upon record this idea, that I believe that a force of fifteen thousand men is all that is necessary for the ample protection of the lives, liberties, and property of the people of this country.

I do not hold to that idea that some gentlemen hold to, that you must have a large standing Army here to keep down bread riots and labor riots and all that kind of thing. I believe that it is the bounden duty of the States to suppress all internal disturbance within their limits and that no governor of an enlightened State or Territory, and they are all such, discharges the duty which he owes to his immediate people and to the people of the country, until in conjunction with the Legislature of his State or Territory he has established a well-organized militia. Nor do I believe it is right to rely on the regular Army in case even of grave and serious invasions and insurrections such as we have passed through. This small nucleus is all that is necessary and I would limit that nucleus to fifteen thousand men.

Gentlemen have talked of the fact that West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, three great States, called on the Federal authorities for the purpose of suppressing the riots that occured last year. I do not say it because I stand here as a Kentuckian, proud of the magnificence of my own State, but I state as a matter of history, and the newspapers will show it, that the most violent outrage that occurred anywhere in the United States last summer occurred in the city of Louisville, the principal city of my State, and in less than twenty-four hours the citizens of Louisville by their own strong right arms put down that insurrection and quelled it. And so it can be everywhere. In an emergency of that sort you cannot depend and you ought not to depend upon the Federal Government to suppress such insurrection. We are told that we need the Army to put down labor riots, bread riots, such as occurred last year. But mark you, Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who do not charge those riots to the laboring classes at all; they were brought about by the communists in this country, not by the bone and sinew of the country. And if in the city of Pittsburgh and in some other places they had done as they did in the city of Louisville with that commune and had not been so sparing of powder and ball, those insurrections would have been quelled without any necessity for calling upon the General Government for aid.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] has expired.

Mr. DURHAM. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, I renew the pro forma amendment. Within the last few years there have been found new uses for the Army. The Army in 1860, and prior thereto, was employed for very different purposes from those which have obtained recently.

During the last ten years not one-half of our Army has been employed for legitimate purposes. Its use has consisted mainly of running elections and keeping the dominant party in power. I hold in my hand the official documents to prove this fact. Immediately after the adjournment of Congress in 1876 the then Secretary of War and the General of the Army issued their orders for the concentration of troops in the Southern States for the purpose of carrying the Presidential election. On the same day of the adjournment the Secretary issued this order, which was promulgated two days afterward by the General of the Army:

[General Orders No. 85.]

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, August 17, 1876.

The following communication, received from the War Department, is published for the information of all concerned:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, August 15, 1876.

General W. T. SHERMAN,
Commanding United States Army:

SIR: The House of Representatives of the United States, on the 10th instant, passed the following preamble and resolution, namely:

"Whereas the right of suffrage prescribed by the constitutions of the several States is subject to the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which is as follows:

"'ARTICLE XV.

"'SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

"'SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.'

"And whereas the exercise of the right of suffrage so prescribed and regulated should be faithfully maintained and observed by the United States and the several States and the citizens thereof; and whereas it is asserted that the exercise of the right of suffrage is in some of the States, notwithstanding the efforts of all good citizens to the contrary, resisted and controlled by fraud, intimidation, and violence, so that in such cases the object of the amendment is defeated; and whereas all citizens, without distinction of race, or class, or color, are entitled to the protection conferred by such article: Therefore,

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That all attempts by force, fraud, terror, intimidation, or otherwise, to prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage in any State should meet with certain, condign, and effectual punishment, and that in any case that has heretofore occurred or that may hereafter occur in which violence or murder has been or shall be committed by one race or class upon the other, the prompt prosecution and punishment of the criminal or criminals in any court having jurisdiction is imperatively demanded, whether the crime be one punishable by fine or imprisonment or one demanding the penalty of death."

The President directs that, in accordance with the spirit of the above, you are to hold all the available force under your command (not now engaged in subduing the savages of the western frontier) in readiness to be used, upon the call or requisition of the proper legal authorities, for protecting all citizens, without distinction of race, color, or political opinion, in the exercise of the right to vote as guaranteed by the fifteenth amendment; and to assist in the enforcement of "certain, condign, and effectual punishment" upon all persons who shall "attempt by force, fraud, terror, intimidation, or otherwise, to prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage," as provided by the laws of the United States, and have such force distributed and stationed as to be able to render prompt assistance in the enforcement of the law.

Such additional orders as may be necessary to carry out the purpose of these instructions will be given to you from time to time, after consultation with the law-officers of the Government.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

By command of General Sherman:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

"The President directs," says the Secretary, "that, in accordance with the spirit of the above, you are to hold all available force under your command in readiness." This deduction is as insincere as it is illogical. The resolution of the House invoked the courts, not the military power, to enforce the laws; but the concentration of troops began at once and was kept up until complete military occupation was had of several States.

On the 14th of October, 1876, this telegram was sent by General Sherman to General Ruger, who had previously been transferred to Columbia, South Carolina:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Washington, October 14, 1876.

To General RUGER,
Columbia, S. C.:

We are all back from California. If you want anything, say so. I want all measures to originate with you. Get along with the minimum force necessary, but you shall have all we can give if you need them.

W. T. SHERMAN, General.

On the 16th of October General Ruger answered that telegram, as follows:

COLUMBIA, S. C., October 16, 1876.
(Received Washington, D. C., 11.7 a. m.)

To General W. T. SHERMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Think I have troops sufficient unless circumstances change. Have nineteen companies in State now in stations of from one to four companies. Have some companies still in reserve. No special disorder has occurred since Ellenton riot last month. If I need more troops will ask for them. I shall be here to-day.

RUGER.

Notwithstanding that telegram from General Ruger, in which he said that all was peaceful and quiet there, and that if he needed more troops he would call for them, and without further information, the very next morning a proclamation was issued by President Grant, from Washington City, declaring South Carolina in insurrection, and there followed numerous telegrams from the General of the Army, ordering all the troops from the Atlantic coast, from the extreme North to as far south as Fortress Monroe, into the State of South Carolina. Here is a specimen of the telegrams sent:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Washington, October 17, 1876.

To General W. S. HANCOCK,
Commanding Military Division Atlantic, New York City:

It will be necessary to reinforce General Ruger to the maximum possible, and we may have to order every available man from the North Atlantic posts.

Acknowledge receipt.

W. T. SHERMAN, General.

In obedience to these orders from Washington, all available forces were sent into South Carolina and other Southern States under pretense of preserving order, but with the purpose and effect of carrying the election. Actual military possession was taken of those States and the elections were controlled in violation of the Constitution of your country, in violation of law, and in violation of every principle of justice and right.

Not only that; it did not stop there; military possession of those States was continued until long after the election. The Legislature of South Carolina was organized, not by the members who were elected to it, but by the Administration here in Washington through the use of Federal troops. I hold here in my hands the official telegrams relating to that organization. There was a dispute about certain members from Edgefield and Laurens who held the certificate of the supreme court; they were to be ejected. Governor Chamberlain sent this telegram to Washington City:

COLUMBIA, S. C., December 1, 1876. (Received 5.40.)

Hon. J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War, Washington:

Cannot Edgefield and Laurens men be removed? They are now acting as members, and have no credentials. If they are removed, the house can act and order be restored. Cannot we be protected against unlawful intrusion, when we have no power to enforce the exclusion?

D. H. CHAMBERLAIN,
Governor.

Then followed a telegram from the Attorney-General to Governor Chamberlain, and also one to General Ruger from the Secretary of War. Here they are:

WASHINGTON, December 2, 1876.

Gov. D. H. CHAMBERLAIN,
Columbia, S. C.:

The President thinks that you should exercise your own resources as governor in behalf of the Legislature which you have recognized, by assisting it to purge itself of unauthorized persons.

If you are resisted in this, General Ruger has been instructed to enforce your authority.

ALPHONSO TAFT,
Attorney-General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., December 2, 1876.

To General T. H. RUGER,
Columbia, S. C.:

The governor of the State of South Carolina should exercise his own resources to purge the Legislature which he has recognized of unauthorized persons. If he is resisted in this, it will become your duty to enforce his authority.

J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

Subsequently the following telegrams were sent in relation to the same subject:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington City, December 3, 1876.

General T. H. RUGER,
Columbia, S. C.:

Fearing your instructions may be conflicting and leave you in doubt as to your duties in the present unhappy condition of affairs in South Carolina, I wish to say this: Governor Chamberlain is the legal constituted governor of the State, and remains so until the Legislature canvasses the vote and installs his successor; and he is entitled as such to your support and protection. It is a civil duty to organize the Legislature devolving on State authorities. All you can do is to prevent unauthorized persons from forcibly interfering with the governor and other authorized officers in the performance of their duties. To be plain, I want to avoid anything like an unlawful use of the military, but it will be entirely right to sustain the governor, or any of his agents or officers, in the performance of any duty in connection with the Legislature if interfered with by outsiders while in the performance of that duty.

U. S. GRANT.

COLUMBIA, S. C., December 5, 1876.
(Received at 1.45 p. m.)

To Hon. J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

General Ruger announces this morning that he will no longer guard doors of State-house. The city is filled with armed and violent men. There is greater need than ever before of protection of State-house. Specific orders must be sent respecting this matter at once, in order to avert riot and bloodshed. Vacillation here now is most unfortunate.

Please answer. All I ask is that State-house be protected against violence.

D. H. CHAMBERLAIN,
Governor of South Carolina.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, December 5, 1876—3.20 p. m.

To Governor D. H. CHAMBERLAIN,
Columbia, S. C.:

General Ruger's instructions are to protect the Legislature from all outside interference, and those instructions will be repeated.

J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KENNA. I take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SOUTHARD.]

Mr. SOUTHARD. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy.

I hold in my hand the official testimony taken in relation to use of troops at the presidential election before a special committee of the last Congress of which the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] was chairman and I was a member. The publication of this testimony could not be obtained at the time, but I have it as it was written. In it I find the testimony of General Ruger in plain and unmistakable terms that he construed these telegrams to him to mean that the Laurens and Edgefield members and the other conservative members of the South Carolina Legislature were the "unauthorized persons." And he interpreted these telegrams aright, for they could have no other significance; and accordingly he took steps to enforce these orders. The telegrams and the testimony of General Ruger I will insert in my remarks.

General Ruger sent word by his orderly to the Legislature of South Carolina, after the two bodies convened in the hall of the State-house, telling the conservative members that they must not be there at twelve o'clock on the next day. In obedience to that order they withdrew, and having withdrawn, a committee waited upon General Ruger and asked him if these members would be permitted to return the next day, and he told them that they must not go back. Here is the testimony of General Ruger:

Question. Did you give Governor Chamberlain any assurance that you would aid his force in excluding anybody at that time from the hall of the house? I mean while the two houses were in session together.

Answer. I had some orders in reference to that subject, but I gave Governor Chamberlain no such assurance, prior to receipt of such orders, that I would aid him in excluding any members.

Q. What orders did you have?

A. I think you have the telegrams here.

Q. At a still later period than that you did make some order in reference to the exclusion of certain persons from the house?

A. A committee of the conservative legislature called upon me and submitted certain propositions in writing; I do not recollect now exactly the words, or perhaps the substance, but they asked that they should be permitted to occupy the hall as the legally constituted Legislature. I told them that if their body went to the hall for the purpose of entering there as the lower house of the Legislature they would not be permitted to enter, that is, that if they were refused admission by the civil officers or the civil guards at the door; and if the doorkeeper should call upon the military officers there to prevent their forcible entrance or assist in doing so the officers would prevent it. That was after they had gone out in the first place and when they proposed to go back, but they did not go back.

Q. What authority did you have or for what reason did you make that order?

A. My reason for it was the instructions which I had and my understanding of my duty under the circumstances. Governor Chamberlain called upon me before that for assistance in enforcing the authority of the speaker, I think. He made a verbal application and afterward made an application in writing the same day. That was, I think, on the 30th of November. I had declined and had reported the state of the case to General Sherman, and the dispatch which I received in reply to that was that he (the governor) should exercise his own resources to purge the Legislature he had recognized of unauthorized persons, and in case he was resisted that I should assist him. I think those were the words or substance.

Q. That was in reference to the members from Laurens and Edgefield Counties?

A. I presume so. I had also before that application by the committee of the conservative house received a dispatch to prevent unlawful interference with the Legislature by outsiders.

Q. You left it to him to decide which was the lawful Legislature?

A. I considered that the other, that is the one called the conservative house, should be classed as outsiders. I did not assume anything as to the legal status, but I considered it within the intent of my orders that I should support the authority of the governor.

Q. I think you did not get quite through your statement as to your answer to the committee that waited upon you.

A. The substance of it was, that if they appeared there, as proposed, for the purpose of occupying the hall of the house of representatives, and if they were refused admission by the persons at the door—the State constables or persons having charge as doorkeepers—and such persons should call on the officers in command of the troops at the State-house for assistance to prevent their entrance, it would be his duty under his orders to give it. If they were granted admission, of course I should not have prevented their entry.

In response to a question whether General Ruger had not sent his orderly to exclude the conservative members when both parties were in the hall, he said:

A. I did at one time send word to Speaker Wallace by Major Maginnis that at twelve o'clock the next day the members from Laurens and Edgefield should or must not be there. My impression was that the Legislature would adjourn that evening, and that when they came back at twelve the next day these members should not come. But that had nothing to do with the application by the governor. Several gentlemen had been to see me before that, and had asked whether I should give orders to exclude the members who had certificates signed by the secretary of state or prevent their entering the hall. I said that I should not. They asked if I would say that the members who had certificates from the supreme court might go in; I said I would not consent. That would have brought up a new subject, and I did not know what it might call forth; also I did not regard it within my authority. I was told by these gentlemen that the members who had the certificate from the secretary of state would probably go to the hall, and when I heard that the conservative house had gone up and taken possession of the hall, I thought that I had not been fairly treated. I suppose that Mr. Wallace knew of this conversation.

Q. While the two bodies were in the house together and while the two speakers were on the stand, was word sent by you to Mr. Wallace, the speaker, that at twelve o'clock the next day the Laurens and Edgefield members must not be there?

A. I do not remember that I said that they must not be there; I think I said either must or should not, but which expression I used I do not remember.

Q. Do you know whether that message was repeated the second time?

A. I think not. I told Major Maginnis to say to Mr. Wallace that these members should not or must not be there at the time of meeting next day.

Q. Were they in the House at that time?

A. Yes, sir; so I understood at the time. I gave the message to Major Maginnis.

So it is, Mr. Chairman; in a free Republic, with a constitution and laws, an Administration is permitted to use the Army to overawe the people of the States, to run their elections, to organize their Legislatures, and to defeat their will at the ballot-box.

I have said this much in justification of the proposition to reduce the Army. If we cannot limit the use of the Army to its legitimate scope, if we cannot keep it within the purview of a proper military service, then it is better for the liberties of the people that there should not be a single, solitary soldier in the whole country. I however would give a sufficient force to protect the border, but I would prohibit the President and his Cabinet from the illegal use of that Army committed to its care for wise and patriotic purposes. Let the power of the law and the condemnation of an outraged people be visited upon all who would abuse this highest of trusts.

But however much we increase the Army, even if we increase it twofold, there is no assurance that the Texas or Indian border will secure an increased force. In the years since the close of the war we had an Army of twenty-five thousand, thirty thousand, and forty thousand men; yet the Texas border has not been furnished on an average two thousand men for its protection. Why, sir, the whole Indian border, out of all this Army has not had an average force of ten thousand troops. The remainder of the force has been patrolling the Southern States during the time of elections under orders from Washington, for the purpose of installing into power in the Federal Government men who could not get there by the voice of the people, uninfluenced and unawed.

There are always rumors of alarms of Indian outbreaks and communistic troubles on the eve of the passage of the Army bill, but when the appropriations are once made the rumors cease and the unconstitutional and illegal use of the Army continues. For these reasons I heartily second any effort for the purpose of reducing the Army and especially of bringing it within the true scope of its legitimate duties. [Here the hammer fell.] I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I renew the amendment to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, the report of the Secretary of War to the present Congress contains this language:

It must now be accepted as a fact, which experience has demonstrated, that Federal troops may be required not only for the protection of our frontiers, but also to preserve peace and order in our more populous interior.

* * * * * * * *

The Army is to the United States what a well-disciplined and trained police force is to a city, and the one is quite as necessary as the other.

* * * * * * * *

The great value of a strong Federal force stationed in the vicinity of our great cities would be seen in the prevention of mobs and violence, probably far more than in their suppression.

Now, I want to know whether the doctrine is to be established in this land that a State of the Union is a province to be supervised, protected, and governed by the central power of the General Government. This doctrine which is contained in the report of the Secretary of War is monstrous. The language of that officer does not contemplate merely that in the event of trouble or difficulty troops shall be brought from their several stations, but it asserts that it is right and proper they should be stationed near to our cities and populous towns. God forbid that the day should ever come in this country when it shall be necessary that a part of the regular Army be stationed near Philadelphia, near New York, near Boston, in expectation of a revolt. Its purpose would be coercing the people and holding them in terror. We want no such interference by the General Government with the sovereignty of the States. The Army was never established for any such purposes. It is in violation of the principles of the Government and opposed to the sovereign power of the States. Our Government is based upon the intelligence of our people. It is not a government founded upon military power.

Sir, this is not a military Government. John Randolph in the first speech which he made in the old Capitol after his return from England, more than a third of a century ago, used this remarkable language:

Sir, I have been to see the English government. I did not find it in crowned heads, nor lords, nor commons; but I saw forty thousand men dressed in scarlet, with their bayonets gleaming in the sunbeams; and that, sir, was the English government.

This was the language uttered by that great statesman. The English government rests upon bayonets: ours upon the common consent of a free people—the expressed judgment of the majority. We do not want armed men stationed about our great cities; we do not want them at the ballot-boxes; we do not want them at our thresholds to watch our movements. These are not the places for an army. Its place is upon the frontier. I will vote for all the men that may be necessary to protect our frontier from invasion; but I object to stationing armed men in the States, upon the pretext that they are to be regarded as provinces which the General Government is to protect. They are not provinces; they are sovereign States.

Sir, in the name of the great State that I in part represent let me assert that Pennsylvania is able to protect her own people from insurrection at all times and upon all occasions.

We do not want the Army to come there. Last year a part of the Army was sent there against our will; and it did no good. The troops sent to my district did more harm than good; in my judgment, and so thought the best men of my district, they only excited the people and added fuel to the commotion.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he did not have United States troops stationed in his vicinity last year?

Mr. WRIGHT. The republican governor of the State had the United States troops brought there; but I cannot say at whose suggestion. They came, and they had generally a very good time, and then marched away. I saw no mobs to disperse; I saw no property destroyed. I have already said in the early part of this session that there was no occasion or necessity for bringing those troops there. The declared purpose of sending them was to prevent disorder, confusion, riot; but in my district there was no disorder or confusion or riot.

In the absence of these I could not see the necessity of troops. Had the thousands of dollars which it cost the State to support this Army in my district been expended for the relief of hungry men, in my judgment it would have been a wiser and more benevolent measure. This employment of troops under the pretext of preserving order does not comport with my idea of free government. It means coercion on its face. It sounds too much of privileged classes. Who is to judge of the time and occasion when the military power, which the Secretary of War recommends to be posted about our cities, should receive orders to advance? Will it be the civil authorities of the city or some beardless lieutenant in command? This is strange language to come from the head of the Department of War. It is to be hoped that it will not be again repeated. New York and Philadelphia and Boston and Baltimore to be converted into military posts! Has the necessity of such a policy arisen? It is to be hoped not.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I renew the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I notice that the views of most of the members on this floor are largely colored by the views of the constituencies they represent. Members from Pennsylvania vote with remarkable unanimity in favor of the existing tariff; those from the New England States support almost solidly one line of financial legislation. Is it to be wondered at, then, that those living in the West, whose interests are of greater moment, because they are interests of property and life, should be united with like unanimity when the question put to them is, shall we curtail the protection which it is the duty of the Government to give to their people?

Living in a State with three hundred miles of Indian frontier, I cannot bring myself to say that it is a wise policy to reduce the effective force of the Army. Throwing aside the political or semi-political uses to which troops have been or may hereafter be put, I am convinced, from investigation, that to-day, on account of troubles and threatened troubles in the West, there is greater necessity for an effective military force than there has been during a number of years gone by.

Sir, before the years 1850, 1853, and 1854 the western frontier was marked upon our map by almost a continuous straight line drawn from north to south. The vanguard of civilization, the hardy pioneers now demanding protection, were then hovering upon the eastern shores of the Red and Missouri Rivers, ready to cross over and penetrate into the wilderness then wholly given up to the Indians. Since that period emigration has pushed its way into the very heart of the Indian country. The frontier of civilization is no longer designated by a straight line, but is marked by the Indian reservations established under the various treaties; and if members will but turn their eyes to the maps at either corner of this Hall they will see, by the blue and red blotches scattered all over their surfaces and designating Indian reservations, of what the frontier of this country consists to-day. Two hundred and fifty thousand hostile Indians are scattered throughout these reservations and are supposed to be confined upon them, while all around them upon their borders and constantly menaced by the restless savages are the homes and families represented here by the western Members and Delegates from the Territories.

Our western frontier is now the entire region west of the one-hundredth meridian. These reservations are so many smoldering volcanoes of murder and rapine, ready to burst out without a moment's warning, to carry the horrors of Indian massacre by the glare of burning roofs and smoldering firesides in every direction from their borders.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] in alluding to the conditions which he thought should now prompt a reduction of the effective force of the Army, made the point that some fifty-seven posts were ready to be abandoned as being no longer needed by the Government for the protection of its people. Sir, that was true to a certain extent, but the gentleman from New York failed to state that as military posts in Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and other western localities become ready for abandonment as the country settles up, new necessities arise farther to the west, which in reality call, not for the abandonment of these posts, but for the creation of new posts and the transfer of troops to them within the same scope of country.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman from Colorado add that I did state new posts were to be built to the extent of ten called for by the Army, and the committee allowed for them?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I will take the floor, Mr. Chairman, and yield my time to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Now, sir, I maintain that if fifty-seven posts may be abandoned, for every one of such in either of the departments of Dakota, the Platte, Missouri, or Texas a new one must necessarily be constructed in some other locality in these departments. Why, sir, we have a strong proof of this in the necessities of the State I represent. There, as the Secretary of War says, Fort Garland may be abandoned; but the War Department has asked of Congress on three separate occasions that an appropriation be made for the purpose of erecting new posts in its stead farther to the west and in the immediate vicinity of the three thousand Indians in Colorado, who, on account of the neglect of the Government to fulfill its treaty obligations, are ready to burst out at this moment in open war and carry all its horrors to the homes of its people

I desire to say in this connection that my opposition to the reduction of the effective force of the Army is not a captious one. While I am opposed to the proposed reduction, feeling that it is a practical question presenting itself for approval or rejection to every member upon his own knowledge of the wants of the country, whether he is conversant with the science and theory of military organization or not; I am willing to yield whatever opinion I may have as to the details of organization to the superior judgment of the Committee on Military Affairs, who have given their best thought to the subject, and shall vote for the new organization provided for; but I cannot vote to reduce its fighting force below 25,000 men.

Why, sir, if I should vote for the reduction and the threatened outbreak should occur in the State I represent, after millions of dollars of property had been destroyed and hundreds of lives lost I could not very well appease the indignation of my constituents by attempting to prove to them from the figures of the gentleman from New York that twenty thousand men were as effective for their protection as would twenty-five thousand have been.

We have called from that State time and time again for troops to protect our people and allay their fears, and time and time again has the answer come back that the Government had not the troops at its disposal; that if troops were taken from the neighborhood of other reservations those frontiers would be exposed and like dangers would threaten them. [Here the hammer fell.] I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. I renew it.

Mr. Chairman, I do not defend the Army of the United States and here speak for its preservation because I come from a region of country or State which hitherto has had to appeal to that Army to preserve the peace and good order of the community. We were fortunate enough in Ohio, within the last year, to have a Governor (Hon. Thomas L. Young) patriotic enough, strong enough, brave enough, and with moral courage enough, to declare, when there was danger in our State, (to use his own words,) "I will not call on the United States for troops until every able-bodied man in the State of Ohio has been whipped." And he went through on that declaration. But we saw in the East, in Maryland and West Virginia, democratic governors appealing to the President of the United States for troops to preserve peace and order and property in their respective States.

In the West we witnessed the same thing, a democratic governor of Indiana appealing to the President of the United States for troops for the same purpose. In all, ten governors in the last year have made requisition upon the President of the United States for troops to quell disorders. The State of Ohio took care of its own troubles when danger threatened.

But it is not my purpose to pursue this line of argument. It is my duty, as I deem it, as a member of this House to look to the interests of the whole country, and not confine myself to merely local considerations.

The Committee on Appropriations have assumed to report a bill to this House for the reorganization and future government of the Army. The chairman of the Military Committee [Mr. BANNING] said in his speech on yesterday that it became the duty of Congress each year to provide an Army. This is as I understood him. His speech is not in the RECORD this morning. Is it possible that the Army and Navy of the United States have annually to depend for existence on the action of Congress or a single branch of the National Legislature?

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] who has charge of this bill indicates that he borrowed his work from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

This is a warning to the country of what is to be the future policy of the dominant party in this House. Our Army is to be dependent from year to year on the will or political whim of Congress. It may be valuable to examine the history of the proposed legislation in this Congress. It must not be forgotten that the policy of the last House at its last session was to have an army without pay. Upon failure of appropriation again, the Army is to be disbanded. But let us look to the proposed legislation of this House in chronological order.

The chairman of the Military Committee, [Mr. BANNING,] on October 29, 1877, (see RECORD, volume 26, page 179,) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 293) to repeal section 1218 of Revised Statutes, prohibiting the appointment of persons who have served in the civil, military, or naval service of the so-called Confederate States. I give the section proposed to be repealed hereafter.

The repeal of this section indicated to the unsophisticated an ardent desire to open the doors to an enlargement of the Army. Such persons could only see in this that the honorable chairman had concluded that it was impracticable to get good officers from graduates of West Point and from late officers of the Union Army (or from civil life) without selecting from those who have served in some capacity in the confederate military, naval, or civil service.

On January 28, 1878, the member from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING,] in his capacity of chairman of the Military Committee, introduced a bill to reorganize and reduce the Army. It had many remarkable provisions. Section 42 of that bill provided for the repeal of section 1104, which authorizes the enlistment of two cavalry regiments of colored men; of section 1108, which authorizes the enlistment of two infantry regiments of colored men; of section 1218, already referred to; of section 1258, which limited the number of officers on the retired list to three hundred; and of section 1316, which excluded from appointment as cadets at the Military and Naval Academies persons who had been in the confederate service. I will give these sections here:

SEC. 1104. The enlisted men of two regiments of cavalry shall be colored men.

SEC. 1108. The enlisted men of two regiments of infantry shall be colored men.

SEC. 1218. No person who has served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army of the United States.

SEC. 1258. The whole number of officers of the Army on the retired list shall not at any time exceed three hundred, and any less number to be allowed thereon may be fixed by the President in his discretion.

SEC. 1316. No person who has served in any capacity in the military or naval service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed a cadet.

Here is the section of the bill of the chairman of the Military Committee proposing the repeal of the foregoing sections:

SEC. 42. That sections 1104, 1108, 1218, 1258, and 1316 of the Revised Statutes, and all other acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be, and they are hereby, repealed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McCOOK was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. KEIFER.

Mr. KEIFER. My time will not allow me to speculate on the motives for, purposes and designs in, blessings intended by, or evils which are expected to flow from the repeal of these sections now or in the future.

Section 41 of the bill of January 28, 1878, and a section found in a subsequent bill, is the most extraordinary ever proposed, so far as I can learn, in the annals of the American Congress or any other parliamentary body in the civilized world. I give the section here:

SEC. 41. That the troops herein provided for and all others authorized by existing law, including all officers of every grade and in every department of the Army, shall be retained in the service of the United States so long as Congress shall provide for their support, by specific appropriations therefor, and no longer; and if Congress shall refuse or neglect to make the necessary appropriations for that purpose at or before the expiration of the last preceding fiscal year for which such appropriations have been so made, such refusal or neglect shall be deemed equivalent to an express act for the abolition of the military establishment, and the Army shall forthwith be disbanded.

The section if enacted into a law would leave it in the power of Congress or a single branch thereof, by a failure to do its duty in making appropriations, to wipe out the entire Army of the United States. Such is the design of the section, plainly appearing by its language.

This section proposes to legislate in reference to our own violation of duty as members; to legislate in view of a violation of our oaths and the Constitution of the United States. We are required by our constitutional duty to make appropriations to carry on the military arm of the Government.

Now I have gone hastily over this legislation for the purpose of saying that it is not economy that moves some of these men to strike at the military strong arm of the Government. Nor is it the desire, as I think, to relieve the people of the country from taxes, as some of them say. It is not that, Mr. Chairman. If you look into this bill and examine it closely, you will find that it provides for something not known before, or rather it omits to provide for something. It omits to provide for the promotion of officers in their regular order to the highest rank in the Army. The thirty-fourth section of the bill reported by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] the repealing clause of the bill, repeals by implication all the sections I have referred to and leaves the field open in case major-generals die or resign or vacancies happen for the appointment of others in their place without reference to whether they were in the Union Army or out of it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, was recognized, and yielded two minutes to Mr. KEIFER.

Mr. KEIFER. Thanks to the member from Illinois. Under cover of a provision for promotions there is a proviso that second lieutenants shall be appointed from the graduates at the Military Academy or non-commissioned officers in the Army; but very adroitly the committee have left out of the bill any provision for promotions in the line of officers of the Army. It provides that all officers below the rank of colonel, before they shall be promoted to brigadier-general, shall first submit to an examination before a military board. There is no provision in the bill that a colonel or any other officer in the regular line shall be promoted in the order of his rank to the position of a major-general or any other higher office in the Army. We can see underlying this that which more plainly crops out in the proposed legislation of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

I am very sorry I have not time allowed me to fully elaborate the vicious and dangerous legislation now proposed in this House.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I wish the millennium was inaugurated, then we would not need any Army and we could substantially dispense with any form of Government, for everybody would do right; but I fear it will not come in our time, so the people will have to maintain their Government, at the very foundation of which is the covenant that all the people will see that each citizen is protected in all his rights in the manner and form as is provided in the Constitution and laws; and when we fail to protect the people of Texas or any other State against invasion, and in a proper case against domestic violence, then we fail in one of the principal objects for which the Federal Government was formed. When we consider the extent of the country, the unprotected condition of the frontier and the Mexican border, it does appear to me that less than twenty-five thousand enlisted men is not sufficient to afford proper protection to citizens. This is not a large Army.

I have been somewhat amused at the labored efforts of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] and the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. KIMMEL,] as well as others, to give us the testimony of the fathers against a standing army, and the intimation that we who are not in favor of further cutting down the Army are departing from the teachings of the fathers. Now, I want to vindicate the fathers, not condemn them. What are the facts? The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KIMMEL] informs us that in the year 1795 the Army numbered 5,793 men. At that time, as I now recollect, there were four millions of people in the country which made 1 soldier for every 690 citizens. How is it now? We have less than 25,000 soldiers in the Army and there are 45,000,000 of people in the United States, which gives 1 soldier for every 1,800 citizens. So it appears that the fathers, in proportion to the population as well as development of the country, had three times as large a standing Army as we the alleged degenerate sons have. The gentlemen from New York and Maryland are fond of figures. I ask their attention to this example in mathematics. I trust that our children may be enabled to cut down the Army, or rather to dispense with its use, but if it is necessary to protect the border, or enforce the guarantees of the Constitution, then I trust they will provide an army sufficient for this purpose, even if it has to be increased relatively to the size it was in the days of the fathers.

Now a word, Mr. Chairman, as to the use of the Army to suppress domestic insurrection. I do not want the Army to be used to police the States, but I am tired of listening to gentlemen who have been apologizing for the use of the Army in suppressing domestic insurrection when duly called for under the Constitution. Gentlemen who live in Maryland, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania must recollect that with the close connection by railroads between the States that we of the West are almost as much interested in the peace and quiet of their States as of our own. Last year during the riots in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Maryland the labor of over twenty millions of people ceased, all business was stopped, the plow stood in the furrow, and the ring of the hammer was not heard in the shop. All were thankful when the arm of the Federal Government was put in motion, as the Constitution provides, and domestic violence was suppressed, and law and order again reigned.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee informally rose; and Mr. SOUTHARD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 4549) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 1201) for the relief of Drury Bynum; and

A bill (S. No. 796) for the relief of John Henderson.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill of the House of the following title:

The bill (H. R. No. 3373) for the relief of settlers on the public lands under the pre-emption laws.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. HANNA. I renew the amendment. As I understand it, the practical question before the House is simply this: whether or not the effective arm of the service shall be 25,000 or 20,000 men, as provided for in this bill.

Now, I have been a listener to this debate, and I am frank to say that I would have preferred to listen to the delegation from Texas and the Delegates from the Territories and the Representatives of the States that border upon the Territories rather than to gentlemen who live in cities like Cincinnati or in New York or at a conveniently safe distance. I have more confidence in the judgment of men like my friend SCHLEICHER from Texas, who lives upon the border, or my friend from Colorado, [Mr. PATTERSON,] or these young gentlemen from the Territories, than I have of those who are always at a safe distance and spend their time in looking over figures.

I find, on casting my eye over the House, that the opposition to the Army might be divided into three classes: first, those who have more or less jealousy toward the regular Army; secondly, those who have more or less feeling toward the regular Army by reason of its effective use in the past; and, thirdly, those who under the pretense of economy would cut down the Army regardless of the question of adequate protection and security to the lives and property of our citizens. Now, I take the ground that whenever this Government, able as it is to do so, will not furnish adequate protection and security to all its citizens, whether they be in Texas or in Montana, it deserves the scorn and contempt of mankind. No party can afford to take that position; and let me say to my democratic friends that if on the pretense of economy you rob the people of Texas and you rob the people of the Territories of adequate protection, the time will come when you will not only merit, but you will receive the scorn and contempt of every patriotic man in the land.

Economy! Let me submit if it would not be wise economy to furnish the men who live upon the border a force sufficiently adequate to secure protection and furnish it even in advance of incursions from Mexico. The expense of furnishing a few thousand soldiers is not great and the effect of their presence is a guarantee of security to the people of Texas. They would stand there in the face of Mexico as a bulwark and would shield the people of Texas even perhaps without the actual use of arms. And it would be economy to do it rather than to wait until after our fellow-citizens are slaughtered and then incur the expense of raising an army rapidly either by volunteering or by enlistments in the regular Army after the mischief is done.

Were I a member from Texas, as I am from Indiana, my voice would be heard here not only by way of supplication but by way of demand that you furnish adequate protection to my people. They have a right to demand it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PHILLIPS. I renew the amendment. I rise for the purpose of correcting an impression which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] who has charge of this bill and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING,] its putative father, have persistently thrust upon this House. They say that the proper officers of the Army have not recruited the Army up to its standard of 25,000 men; that it is little over 21,000 men, and that the full amount has not been needed for the public service or it would have been had. Now, I want to tell the gentlemen and the House what the facts are. We have to-day, according to the reports of those having charge of the service under the Adjutant-General, in service, as borne on the latest reports, 23,417 men, and there are also 500 or 600 recruits unassigned. The Adjutant-General of the Army has been compelled to check enlistments for fear that those recruited at the enlistment stations might get above the 25,000 men allowed by law, which is all that can be paid. Gentlemen will remember that the reason why we had no enlistments last year was that, for six months, we had no Army appropriation bill. They will remember that the House, in the last Congress, caused the failure of the Army appropriation bill because the Congress would not consent to the reduction of the Army in an appropriation bill, and until Congress met in October last and was able to mature a bill which did not change the law, but was, partially at least, what an appropriation bill should be, there were no means of enlisting men for the Army. By a law of last Congress, 2,500 men were required to be mustered out arbitrarily, and all last summer, and for more than a year, the Army had suffered very heavily from casualties. Since we furnished him appropriations to recruit with at the close of last year, the Adjutant-General has recruited just as fast as he had means to do it, and he has got the Army nearly up to the standard. That is the reason why the enlistments have not been full before, and it was the majority on the other side of this Chamber that was responsible for it. Why should they refuse the funds for enlistment and accuse him for not making enlistments? The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] in his speech gave a list of the posts that he says can be abandoned, and the abandonment of which will show a decreased use for the Army, and for such reasons that the Army should be reduced. And that list includes nearly every post in my State upon the frontier.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. That is the report made by the generals themselves; I am not responsible for it; I am only taking their statements.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I will not raise a question of veracity with the gentleman, but I doubt that very much. I find in the list of forts Fort Lyon, Fort Wallace, Fort Hays, Fort Harker, and Forts Larned and Sheridan, and these are all forts in which soldiers are now stationed. These are forts on the frontier, now occupied and urgently needed, and I do not believe any general has reported that troops are not needed there.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. In Executive Document No. 75, just sent in by the Secretary of War, the gentleman will find all the information he seeks.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I will state as a matter within my own knowledge, that these posts are active posts to-day, defending the frontier, and the gentleman from Colorado and the gentlemen from my own State know that very well, as many other gentlemen, all gentlemen at all familiar with the matter, know. They are posts garrisoned by troops to-day. There may have been letters of some officers recommending relocation of troops for certain reasons or because there were not troops enough in that department. These posts cannot be abandoned consistent with the public safety. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRIDGES] moves to reduce the Army to fifteen thousand men, as an amendment to the bill which reduces it to twenty thousand men, and these propositions are the real question this bill presents to this House for its present action. On the motion to fix the number at twenty-five thousand, as now fixed by law, the whole of this bill rests. He has said that on the Texas frontier the State can repel invasion. He has said that we do not need an Army there; if Mexico permits raids upon our territory we can compel her to give us indemnity, if necessary by annexation. If we declare war against Mexico, where is he going to get his Army from? Does he propose to reduce our Army at the very moment he contemplates war? Does he design that every State adjoining the frontier of another country shall raise troops and go to war with that country? Is that the way to maintain our relations with foreign countries? Is it sufficient? Would it be safe? Is that the economy he proposes, or can States be permitted to carry on war with foreign countries?

Mr. BRIDGES. I propose to hold Mexico responsible for all the injury she does to American citizens.

Mr. PHILLIPS. How?

Mr. BRIDGES. By our Government calling upon the Mexican government to give us redress.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I understood you to say that Mexico should keep men upon her border.

Mr. BRIDGES. If she did not give us redress, then the Government should declare war against her.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Are we not as much bound to protect our frontier as Mexico?

Mr. BRIDGES. And if we follow that course we will get another slice of Mexico; and if that is not sufficient we will get another slice, and by and by we will have the whole of it.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Does the gentleman propose to get slices of Mexico by exposing our defenseless citizens on the frontier to murder?

Mr. BRIDGES. No, sir; I do not do that. I propose that our Government shall give notice to the Mexican government we will hold them responsible for all the depredations they commit upon the property of our citizens.

Mr. PHILLIPS. And, contemplating war, you propose to reduce the Army?

Mr. BRIDGES. I am very willing that a sufficient number of men should be sent there for protection. We do not know how many troops are needed there, whether two thousand, three thousand, or five thousand. If five thousand are needed there, then let them go; we do not want them anywhere else.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Does not the gentleman well know that we never had troops enough on that frontier even with an army of twenty-five thousand men to protect our frontiersmen there and their property?

Mr. BRIDGES. Where are the troops, then? Where are they stationed?

Mr. HASKELL. Nowhere.

Mr. BRIDGES. Nowhere?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I tell the gentleman they are scattered over thousands of miles of country; scattered over immense regions, over which wild nomads rove; scattered along an external frontier of twelve or fifteen thousand miles, never adequate to the tasks assigned to that Army.

Mr. HASKELL. We have no troops to station anywhere; only a corporal's guard here and there.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PHILLIPS] has expired.

Mr. COBB. I favor the bill now pending. This Government is based upon the consent of the governed, and I insist that you cannot maintain this Government by a standing army. It may be well enough to have a standing army to protect our frontiers. The only question in my mind is whether or not the number of men provided for by this bill is sufficient for that purpose. From the best investigation I have been able to give the subject, I believe that the number provided by this bill is ample for that purpose.

The people of this country demand retrenchment and reform. It is provided for in this bill and it will meet their approbation, and anything further will meet their condemnation. I want to say this to my colleague from Indiana, [Mr. HANNA,] for whom I have great respect: he has said that any party that stands in the way of what I understand him to mean the increase of the Army will meet the condemnation of the people. Now, I say to him that I am ready to meet the condemnation of my people so far as they are disposed to put it upon me for voting for this bill.

Now, so far as police regulations are concerned, and I would not have spoken upon this bill but for that, it has been charged here that the governor of Indiana during the great strikes of last summer called upon the President of the United States for troops. I deny it; he did not do any such thing.

I will state another thing; that the mayor of Indianapolis, and I say this for the benefit of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] and I make the statement in the hearing of my colleague from the Indianapolis district, [Mr. HANNA,] the mayor of Indianapolis, together with the governor of Indiana, refused to call upon the President of the United States for troops. They refused to have any military authorities take charge of the strike at Indianapolis.

I was present when the trial was going on in the district court of the United States of the charge of contempt against some of the strikers. I heard the evidence of the mayor of Indianapolis, Mr. Cavin, whom I have known for twenty years. I heard him state that he did not believe there could have been military force enough concentrated at Indianapolis to have suppressed that strike. And further, when the question was propounded to him why he did not swear in a sufficient police force to suppress the strike, he stated under oath in court that the reason why he did not do it was because he did not believe there were men enough in the city of Indianapolis to be sworn in upon the police force to suppress the strikers.

As the evidence clearly shows in that case, and the evidence is upon record, there was no necessity whatever for a military force. Mr. Cavin, the mayor of Indianapolis, together with Governor Williams, was in consultation with the leaders of the strikers every day, and they had their promise that no injury should be inflicted upon public property or upon private property. If troops had been sent there, it was the opinion of Mayor Cavin that it would have produced a collision at once and a great destruction of property.

One other thing which I know in regard to that matter: I myself live in a railroad town. There was a strike there; and over five hundred strikers were banded together. They refused to allow any trains to run except mail and passenger trains upon the various roads. I was in consultation with the leaders of those men, and they told me that if troops came there they would defend themselves; but as long as they were allowed to meet and determine what course they should pursue in reference to going to work, and were permitted to make a compromise with the managers of those roads, they would remain quiet, and they did remain quiet.

Finally, fifty troops were sent down there; but I state here upon my honor, and it will not be contradicted anywhere, that before they came I, together with the good citizens in my city, had got the "strikers" to agree to disband and go to work. I state with equal emphasis that if those troops had come there two days sooner, in my judgment, the machine shops of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad, together with much property adjacent, would have been destroyed. I have said this much, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the charge that the governor of Indiana, being a democrat, as we know he is, called upon the President for troops. He did not; he refused it.

Mr. KEIFER. Do you say that he did not call upon the President?

Mr. COBB. I say he did not call upon the President for troops.

Mr. KEIFER. What did he call upon the President for?

Mr. COBB. He did not call on him for anything to my best recollection.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then the gentleman says there was no correspondence between the President of the United States and the governor of Indiana?

Mr. COBB. No, sir; I do not say that. He did telegraph to the President——

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. He telegraphed to the Secretary of War for assistance. It seems that he had not the requisite legal knowledge to make a formal requisition. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. It may do for my colleague to make that statement; but I will say that the governor of Indiana understands how to govern that State as well as the gentleman or any of his friends; and this he has shown by his acts.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HANNA. I believe the gentleman will bear me witness that I did not say a word about the governor of Indiana or about "strikers."

Mr. COBB. No, sir; I was replying to my other colleague.

Mr. CAIN obtained the floor and yielded one minute to Mr. GARFIELD.

Mr. GARFIELD. In reply to what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] has just said, I ask that the paper which I send to the desk, be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Telegram.]

INDIANAPOLIS, INDIANA, July 26, 1877.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.:

In view of the threatened domestic violence growing out of the railroad strike, I request that authority be at once given to the commandant of the arsenal to render me all the aid possible in preserving the public peace.

JAMES D. WILLIAMS,
Governor of Indiana.

[Laughter and applause on the republican side.]

Mr. COBB. Now, Mr. Chairman, if you will allow me, that is no call. The matter is just as I stated. I admit the fact that there was some telegraphic——

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The governor was laying a trap for the President.

Mr. COBB. That may be; I do not pretend to speak as to that; but I state the fact——

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order and gentlemen will resume their seats.

Mr. KEIFER. Then the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] withdraws his statement.

Mr. COBB. No, sir; I do not. If I may be allowed I can explain this matter in a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CAIN] has the floor, and the Chair cannot at this time recognize any other person as entitled to speak.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. Chairman, I should not at this time obtrude any thoughts on the House but for an allusion which has been made in the course of this discussion to the employment of the Army in the State of South Carolina during our last election. I wish to say that whatever may have been the course pursued by the Administration at that time, it ought not to have any bearing upon the question now before the House involving the maintenance of the Army and the honor of our country.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] was pleased to read from evidence taken in the State of South Carolina, which he adduced as one of the reasons why the Army should now be reduced. In my judgment there was ample reason why the Army should have been used in South Carolina at the period referred to.

It will be borne in mind that the Constitution makes it the duty of the Legislature or the executive of a State to call on the General Government for aid in times of insurrection or rebellion. Mr. Chamberlain, then governor of South Carolina, did but perform his duty, according to his view, in calling for troops; and I think the evidence will bear me out in the statement that at no time in the history of our troubles in South Carolina have the Federal troops been sent into that State or used there except in pursuance of a call made by the executive of the State in pursuance of authority conferred by the Constitution. Sir, it is no less the duty and the privilege of the governor of South Carolina than of the executive of any other State to invoke the aid of the Federal Government when required in time of insurrection, rebellion, or domestic violence. The Constitution makes it the duty of the Federal Government to protect its citizens in the full enjoyment of all the rights guaranteed to them by the laws and the Constitution. It is also made the duty of the State executive to call for the assistance of the Federal Government in this direction.

Sir, it is a remarkable fact which gentlemen here forget to note that while in those counties of South Carolina in regard to which complaint is made there were but one hundred and seventy-one troops, there were at the same time over seven hundred rifle clubs organized in the State. The number of troops in the whole district was only two hundred and two, scattered about in seven different departments.

Mr. JOYCE. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. CAIN. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, whatever may have been the difficulties of the past as this is the era of shaking hands over the bloody chasm, of general conciliation, the era of friendship and goodwill—it seems to me at this time this Government should give its attention to the general welfare of the whole people and for the maintenance of the Army intact that it may suppress insurrection wherever it may lift its head and the protection of our frontiers wherever threatened. The Government should secure to the citizens of this Republic the fullest protection. That is the duty which this Government owes to every citizen. For, sir, ours is a great and a growing country. It is growing in population along the lines of travel into the vast country unexplored and unsettled. Indians are rising up in different sections to retard our advancement. If the Government does not give protection there must be an end to all advancement. There must be an end to the marvelous progress heretofore witnessed. Therefore I think the reasons given by gentlemen for the reduction of the Army do not have such weight as should induce us to vote with them.

South Carolina has done her duty in every respect, and she will still continue to discharge her duties and obligations to her people and to the Union. The authority conferred upon the Government to protect its citizens is indeed one which should be continued.

If we strike down the Army we will take away the means of adequate protection on the part of the Government. This, it appears to me, is no time to retrench in that direction. Ours, I repeat, is a great and growing country. Millions are pushing forward to accomplish the purposes of civilization, and every advantage should be given them to advance their prosperity and to protect them in all their rights. The troops, so far as the States are concerned, should also be used for the protection of the people at home.

I think there is more involved in this question than is found on the surface. There is a destiny for this nation; there is a great and glowing prospect before us. We must give such strength and such power to protect the country as is necessary for its advancement. Having said thus much, I hope this question may be determined as is best conducive to the interests of the Government and the whole people.

Mr. COX, of New York. If the amendment to reduce to fifteen thousand were not pending, I would make a substantial amendment to strike out "twenty thousand" and insert "thirteen thousand."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania who submitted that amendment has withdrawn it.

Mr. COX, of New York. Then I renew it, to make the number fifteen thousand.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, the House of Representatives in discussing bills of this nature gets away from the main question, that which concerns our polity and that which concerns our civilization. I know I am surrounded here by men who are soldiers; I see men on the other side who have been soldiers; but I believe the great idea of civilization and Christianity does not consist in killing one another. I have some old-fashioned Christian ideas in connection with armies. Of course I should not expect to impress any Christian idea upon this House at this time. [Laughter.]

What is an army? An army is an organized body for war. What is a militia? It is a body enrolled for discipline to be called out on emergencies. I venture to say, Mr. Chairman, that the whole theory, genius, polity, and system of our Government consists in having a militia instead of an army especially for internal work for the preservation of peace in the States and for State and personal liberty. That was the way in the old times we regarded the Army and the militia. I might go back to Jefferson's inaugural and startle the other side of the House, if not this, by reading some plain precepts.

The support of the State governments in all their rights, as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns, and the surest bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies. * * * A well-disciplined militia our best reliance in peace, and for the first moments of war, till regulars may relieve them.

[Laughter on the republican side of the House.]

What is there about that that is jocular? Why do the thorns crackle under the republican pot? [Laughter.] Till regulars can in some way displace the militia! I have not seen a regular on that side of the House. [Laughter.] "Regulars" simply means what the Constitution meant. The militia were not "regulars." Anybody who has been in a muster must have seen that in the old days.

In our Constitution, when providing that Congress shall have power to do so and so, it is said they shall have power—

To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasion;

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States.

The militia were to be relied upon in any emergency, not the regulars. It seems to me the gentlemen on the other side have got scared at the idea of some ghastly communism that is coming forward. The men only scare who are bad and do not do justice to the laboring people. Had labor its full justice done to it in this country there would have been no need and no call either for regulars or for the militia.

Now we have some twenty-one thousand regulars in this country. Where are they? Why, sir, in Texas, according to the report on the Texas border troubles, page 66, there are four thousand and thirty-one on that border, enough in all conscience for all purposes of border warfare. Where are the rest? Two thousand are scattered among the several States. What for? There are some twenty-seven hundred of what is called the staff service. What does the staff service include? The men detailed at West Point, hospital stewards, ordnance sergeants, commissary sergeants, Indian scouts, available recruits at depots, men detailed for service in the War Department. And there are some ten thousand out on our borders watching the Indians.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. EDEN obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. COX, of New York.

Mr. COX, of New York. One word more. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the great idea of this country of military force connects itself by our history, by our traditions, and by ordinary good sense with the militia system. And now I come to the point, why is it that in New York State, whose militia acted so well during the last summer, and which is kept up at a great expense of millions to our people, we are at the same time compelled to pay taxes for a regular Army besides for certain purposes which our militia will fulfill in all regards? Are we to pay taxes for the militia of West Virginia, or of Pennsylvania, or of Maryland, or of Indiana, or any other State where they fail to keep up their own militia system? New York did her duty through her governor. No one reproaches her. And what I say is that this Congress should fulfill its constitutional duty and compel the States to keep up the militia system to the end that all these domestic insurrections may be suppressed by citizen soldiery and not by an army, a standing army, however small or however great, that may at any time be used for despoiling the people of their liberties.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I wish to ask the gentleman if he can tell me how much it requires to pay the expenses of guarding the harbor of New York?

Mr. COX, of New York. When I answer that question fully, as I propose to do, I will send to my friend from Kansas the statistics in detail. I will say this to him now, that New York is the entrepôt of the commerce of the Union. Two-thirds of all our exports and imports are there. Two-thirds of our collections are there. The post-office even of New York is the post-office of Kansas, and when New York is guarded, Kansas is guarded. We stand before bleeding Kansas and protect you in your innocence and simplicity. [Laughter.] I will send the gentleman the statistics at my leisure.

I have only this, Mr. Chairman, to say in conclusion: that I do not believe an Army of twenty thousand men is needed for any good purpose in this country. If there is any design on the part of the Administration, of which we are not advised, I want to do as the English Parliament does—I want that we shall control the use of the Army. To-day they are debating in the English Parliament the question whether the English troops shall be used, or whether the India troops coming into Europe shall be used to fight Russia. The English Parliament says to the army "Thus far thou shalt come and no farther." They impose provisos and restrictions at all times on the use of their army. And it would have been the part of wisdom if you gentlemen of the South had adopted my amendment as to Louisiana four years before you did. If we had had the power of the sword as well as of the purse, we should have compelled honest government in Louisiana, South Carolina, and Florida four years sooner by having the purse-strings and the power of the sword together.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HASKELL. I desire to correct a possible misapprehension that may have arisen from the speech of the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.] In giving a list of the Government posts which he says may be peacefully, justly, and safely abandoned, he quotes in his speech letters from the commanding generals of the various departments. In regard to my own State, he recommends that Lyon, Wallace, Hays, Harker, Craig, and McRae be abandoned, and he quotes the letter of General Pope, commanding that district. But the gentleman from New York undoubtedly misinterpreted the letter of General Pope. He uses it as an argument for keeping there a less number of troops. But General Pope does not say that. He says:

> The larger the bodies of troops concentrated at any given point, the less will be the cost of supplying them. When to this fact is added the great benefit in discipline and efficiency they are certain to derive from concentration, it should seem that consolidation of posts ought to be the policy of the War Department. As before stated, the difficulty of making a concentration lies in the want of shelter at any of the points which might be chosen.

That is his argument. He says that if you abandon these posts you must concentrate the troops now scattered at the various forts all at one point right upon our borders; right where they are needed. He does not recommend the withdrawal of a single man, and toward the conclusion of his letter he says:

> With the understanding, therefore, that shelter for the troops now at the posts I shall refer to will be provided at the posts I suggest shall be maintained, I give a list of the military posts in this department which, in my opinion, can be given up.
> If it be not considered well to build quarters for the troops now occupying the posts to be given up, I have to say that the only posts which can be abandoned now are Fort Harker, Kansas, and gradually Fort Craig, New Mexico.

Now, the argument of the gentleman from New York to show that in the number of posts and frontier establishments the ratio has decreased from one hundred and ten to seventy-seven is all erroneous; that is not the statement of the commanding general; he would have more troops there than he has to-day, but he simply advises the diminution of the number of posts, in order to concentrate the number of troops at a given point.

If members of the committee will examine the map they will see that my State has four hundred miles of southern boundary lying along the line of the Indian reservations. They would see that, instead of that country being a wilderness, right upon the line of that Indian Territory, for two hundred miles, there is a rural population scattered there as thickly as it is in Maryland or Virginia. All along that line upon one side you see the smiling farms of the Kansas farmers, and you can see for miles and miles the dividing line between my State and the Indian Territory, for upon the one side there are farms, churches, schools, houses, and orchards, and upon the other the wilderness, inhabited by the savages. And it is from this country and from the posts scattered all along that frontier that the gentleman would have the troops withdrawn by cutting down the force of the Army.

Now the general commanding simply says that he would diminish the number of posts in order to concentrate a larger body at one place, so as to make them more effective, and it is wrong to place any officer on the western frontier in the position of saying that he has more troops than he needs and that the Army can be reduced.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived and that being the time fixed by the House at which it would take a recess, the committee will rise without further order and the Speaker pro tempore will resume the chair.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4857) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

GENERAL JAMES SHIELDS.

Mr. SPRINGER. This morning the Senate sent over a resolution asking for the return of the House bill in relation to placing General Shields upon the retired list of the Army. I ask unanimous consent that that resolution shall be taken up and the request of the Senate granted.

There was no objection; and the message of the Senate was read, as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, May 21, 1878.

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the House bill No. 4245, authorizing the President of the United States to appoint James Shields, of Missouri, a brigadier-general in the United States Army on the retired list.

There was no objection, and the request of the Senate was granted.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 933) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to refund a certain tax erroneously collected; and

A bill (S. No. 1021) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I give notice that I will not move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Army appropriation bill until to-morrow morning, and then I will move to go into committee immediately after the reading of the Journal, leaving the session of to-night for general business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the session to-night is for general business, and that it is necessary that a quorum should be present, because any gentleman may call up this bill or any other.

Mr. BURCHARD. I give notice that I shall insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived, by previous order of the House the House now takes a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a privileged question.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to report a bill for printing and recommittal.

Mr. BUTLER. I am willing to yield for a time to gentlemen who desire to present matters that will give rise to no debate.

NAVIGABLE WATERS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 2464, to declare and define the jurisdiction of the United States over the harbors and navigable waters of the United States, a bill (H. R. No. 4953) of the same title; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

MISSISSIPPI LEVEES.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Levees and Improvement of the Mississippi River, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 4318) to provide for the organization of the "Mississippi River improvement commission," and for the correction, permanent location, and deepening of the channel, and the improvement of navigation of said Mississippi River and the protection of its alluvial lands; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

METHOD OF ELECTING PRESIDENT AND VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I am instructed by the select committee on the revision of the laws regulating the counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, to report for printing and recommittal the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk. I desire to give notice that on the 4th day of June, I will seek the floor to call up the joint resolution for consideration. I will also state that the minority of the committee have a report to be presented, which I ask may be printed with the report of the majority.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 183) proposing an amendment to the Constitution in relation to the election of President and Vice-President, was received, read a first and second time, with the accompanying report and the views of the minority ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the select committee.

Mr. BURCHARD. All these references are with the understanding that the subjects referred are not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair stated to the House to-day and also stated yesterday, that when any bill is reported and referred by unanimous consent, it is the rule of the House that it shall not be brought back upon a motion to reconsider.

Mr. BURCHARD. The Chair will pardon me for saying that that is not the rule in respect to reports from committees. When a bill is introduced by unanimous consent for reference by a member, the rule is as the Chair has stated; but a report from a committee is an exception.

Mr. SOUTHARD. The select committee has the right to report at any time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is understood that these references are not to be reconsidered.

Mr. LAPHAM, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 3527) for the relief of Newton S. Murphey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT COURTS IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. LAPHAM. I ask unanimous consent to report back, with a favorable recommendation, from the Committee on the Judiciary, for consideration at the present time, the bill (H. R. No. 3658) to change the time of holding the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the western district of Michigan. There was no objection whatever to this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. If this bill can be passed without discussion I do not object; but should there be debate upon it I must demand the regular order.

Mr. LAPHAM. There is no dispute about the bill whatever. Its passage is recommended by the judges and by the members of the bar.

Mr. STONE, of Michigan. The bill is very important for the convenience of our people.

The bill was read. It provides that the times of holding the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the western district of Michigan be on the first Tuesdays of April and October of each year, instead of the third Mondays of May and October, as now provided by law; and that all recognizances, indictments, writs, processes, and other proceedings, civil and criminal, now pending in either of said courts, may be entered, heard, and tried at the times herein fixed for holding said courts.

The second section provides that this act shall take effect on the 1st day of July, 1878, and the provisions of sections 572 and 658 of the Revised Statutes of the United States inconsistent therewith are repealed.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LAPHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

Mr. BALLOU, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4955) authorizing the purchase by Congress of the owners and proprietors certain property known as the Congressional Globe; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

JEAN FRANÇOIS PERRY.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, reported back, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 2361) for the relief of Jean Francois Perry; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

THOMAS POULTNEY.

On motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Patents was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1580) for the relief of Thomas Poultney; and the same was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

JOHN BORDEN.

Mr. RIDDLE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4956) granting a pension to John Borden, father of William Borden; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. CORNELL.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, by unanimous consent, reported back adversely from the Committee on Naval Affairs the petition of William H. Cornell, late acting third assistant engineer United States steamer Winnebago, for prize money; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state out of abundant caution that as to all references made to-night the motion to reconsider will be regarded as entered, and that motion laid on the table.

OFFICIAL ADVERTISER OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BUTLER. I call up the motion to reconsider the recommitment of the bill (H. R. No. 3079) to provide means for giving official notice of the acts of the Government, and to provide for the advertisement required by the several Departments of the Government. This bill was reported without objection from the Judiciary Committee and ordered to be printed and recommitted. A motion to reconsider was then entered so as to entitle the matter to be called up at any time.

Mr. REAGAN. What length of time will it take to act on this bill?

Mr. BUTLER. A very short time. After I have explained the bill, I think there will be no objection to it.

Mr. REAGAN. If there is any debate, I must call for the regular order.

Mr. BUTLER. The bill has been very fully considered by the Judiciary Committee, and I think there will be no objection to it.

Mr. REAGAN. Let it be read, the right to object being reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to reconsider is a privileged question on which the gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor, unless the question of consideration should be raised.

Mr. REAGAN. The motion to reconsider is privileged, but the consideration of it is not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly it is. This bill has been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Public Printer is authorized and directed to print and publish a weekly paper, to be designated "The Official Advertiser of the United States," uniform in size and type with and upon like paper that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is now printed, which paper shall contain:

First. All the proclamations and executive orders of the President, and all acts and joint resolutions of Congress.

Second. Third. All the matter that is required by law to be published in the Official Gazette of the Patent Office, in the same manner as the same is now published, including the decisions of the Commissioner of Patents, and such decisions of the courts upon patent causes as the Commissioner of Patents may deem it for the public service to be published.

SEC. 2. The orders and advertisements issuing from the several Departments shall be inserted in said Official Advertiser under separate heads of the Department from which, or under the authority of which, or any officer of which such orders are issued, the orders and advertisements under the head of each Department to be put together and so arranged that the orders and advertisements of each Department can be furnished separately when called for, as hereinafter provided; all of which publications shall be official, and shall be so deemed and held to be for all purposes.

SEC. 3. Any Department, bureau, or officer of the United States may order the insertion of any advertisement, order, or circular of information to be published such number of times as the law now requires publications of the same matter in any newspaper, or as the Department, bureau, or officer requiring the same may deem to be for the best interests of the public service.

SEC. 4. Any person desiring to obtain the Official Advertiser may subscribe for it, paying for the same in advance at a price equal to the cost to the United States of the printing, paper, folding, and enveloping, which shall be sent to him through the mail free of charge; or he may subscribe for any part of the Official Advertiser containing the advertisements and orders issuing from any one or more Departments, to be paid for and forwarded in like manner.

SEC. 5. Each Department or bureau of the Government may subscribe, and pay for, and have furnished to them, for public use or distribution, so many copies of the whole, or any part or parts of the same, to be delivered to them at like cost, and which may be distributed by said Department or bureau in like manner, free of cost, under the official signature of some officer designated in said Department or bureau by the head thereof, as the head of such Department or bureau may require. And any officer who shall cause to be inserted any advertisement which he is required to make by law shall have five copies of the numbers containing such advertisement furnished to his order free of cost. SEC. 7. And any copy of said Official Advertiser may be read in evidence in any proceeding as prima facie evidence of the matter therein contained whenever the same may be material to be proven. And all advertisements now required by law to be published by the Government of the United States, or any Department or bureau or officer thereof, shall be deemed and taken to have been duly and legally complied with when the same shall be shown to have been duly published in said Official Advertiser for the times and number of insertions in which the same may be ordered to be published as aforesaid.

SEC. 8. No letter-press printing, or binding of letter-press printing, or advertising shall be done or contracted for by or under the order of any Department, bureau, or officer of the Government, or paid for upon the voucher or certificate of any officer of the Government or other person, other than what is contained in said Official Advertiser, except such printing and binding required by law to be done by the Public Printer; all which is to be done in the Government Printing Office, and not elsewhere.

SEC. 9. Every person who shall knowingly violate any of the provisions of this act by printing or binding at the cost of the Government any letter-press printing whatever, other than that printed in the Public Printing Office, shall be deemed guilty of misdemeanor, and punished, upon indictment and conviction, by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment not more than one year.

SEC. 10. The Public Printer is required to make a report to the House of Representatives, on or before the first Monday of December of each year, containing a just and true account of the whole number of said Official Advertisers printed and furnished by him, to whom furnished, the cost of the same, and of any money that he may have received for the same, specifying the amounts received from any Department, bureau, or officer of the Government for the fiscal year last ended; also an estimate of the cost to the Government for publishing and distributing said Official Advertiser for the next succeeding fiscal year, or part thereof.

SEC. 11. All acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are repealed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, will the House reconsider the vote by which this bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. EDEN. I reserve the right to make a point of order until I can put an inquiry to the gentleman from Massachusetts. Is this bill recommended by the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir; it is reported by that committee. It has been fully considered, having been recommitted three times.

Mr. EDEN. I think it will have to be recommitted again.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. So far as any point of order is concerned, the Chair will state that the bill is not yet before the House and will not be, unless the motion to reconsider should prevail.

Mr. REAGAN. A bill which is the unfinished business of the House is now standing in the way of other business. We could probably consider and dispose of that bill this evening. I trust that the motion to reconsider will be voted down and that we shall proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business—the bill in regard to charges upon interstate transportation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is entitled to the floor on his motion to reconsider.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire a little attention of the House to this which is quite an important matter. I want to assure the House in the first place there is more than a half million dollars saving in this bill.

Let me state the mischief to be remedied. There are now no other means of giving public notice by advertisement than in the newspapers. Nobody can well get them now because the Departments are informed by the newspapers of large circulation they will not print the laws at the price which the law fixes for that printing. These are some of the questions and difficulties before the various Departments on that subject.

Then we have a public printing office down here and most of the members of Congress think that all the public printing is done there and that it is the only printing office in this city in which printing for public purposes is done. I assure them there are six others I know of and I think there are more. The War Department has two, the Interior Department has one, the Treasury Department has one beside the bureau for printing bank notes, bonds, and certificates, the Navy Department has another, and the Attorney-General's office has one also, I think. Now, then, all these are for the purpose of printing circulars and orders, and you have those public documents in all sorts of shapes so you cannot preserve them, and you never know when you have them all. It is now proposed—if I can only have the attention of the three gentlemen in front of me engaged in conversation I will be very much obliged, although it is only the public business we are now considering.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts very properly complains of the confusion created by members standing in the aisles and engaged in conversation. Those who wish to engage in private conversation will retire to the cloak-room, so the public business may proceed in order.

Mr. BUTLER. There is now published, as you all know, the Official Gazette of the Patent Office. There is another little paper published, called, I think, the Land-Office Record, and another little paper called the Internal-Revenue Record. This bill proposes all these shall be cut off, and this publication shall take their place. It is to be issued weekly, to contain all public advertisements of all contracts, and there is an amendment reported by the committee to the bill to have a copy of this paper not only in every public library, in every district, in every clerk's office of the United States, but two copies in every county-court office, so it shall be open to the people, and everybody will know where to go see the laws, orders, and advertisements of the Government and learn exactly what they call for. They will have them there in an official form.

Let me give you an idea, Mr. Speaker, of how tricks are played in regard to advertisements ordered by law. I was not long ago of counsel in a patent case, and it turned out that the patent had been extended. We produced the letter of the one who got the extension. He said he had gone to a newspaper in this city and paid so much money for having the official advertisement of extension here in Washington put in, and then he had three copies struck off, and then had another advertisement put in place of it and the rest of the edition struck off. He said further:

> I now send you one copy, and I want you to put that in the county paper which the law requires, and then have three copies struck off, one for the files of the Patent Office, one for the files of the newspaper office, and one for me, and then have another advertisement of the same size put in and have struck off the rest of the edition.

I want to meet that possibility of such frauds in the future.

In addition, it is proposed to meet a great want known to the country, and that is to get, in some reasonable time and at some reasonable price, the laws and the decisions of the Supreme Court. Therefore there is an amendment, which will be read in a moment, by which the decisions of the Supreme Court are to be published, with a brief abstract of each case, as they come out. As matters now are, the Supreme Court judges before they deliver an opinion have it printed and corrected under their own eye, and when they deliver it we propose to put it in the Official Advertiser instead of waiting the slower process of the bound volumes of the reports.

Every man will not want the whole of this Advertiser. The patent attorney and inventors will want the Patent Office portion of it; the Navy officers will want the naval orders; the military man, the Army orders; the contractor will want advertisements for contracts; the agriculturist will want the Agricultural Bureau part of it, and so on. Therefore this bill provides each Department shall have its orders and advertisements and circulars printed by themselves, so each part can be used by each Department, while the whole will go into every library. Then the bill permits anybody to subscribe for exactly such a part as he wants, or the whole. A patent man subscribes for the patent part; the Navy officer subscribes for the Navy part; the Army officer subscribes for the Army part; the man interested in public lands subscribes for the public lands part; and all this can be had for one-third, if not one-fourth, of the present cost of advertising by the Government.

Now some gentlemen will ask me in his own mind, Can you tell us what the public advertising costs? No, sir; I cannot; and I do not think it can be found out without an expenditure of many thousands of dollars. It dribbles through every office and Department. Why, sir, it is everywhere, and is not to be found; and it is an awful leak, too.

This is the way in which the money goes out. Congress appropriates money for a public work. The public work is advertised for; the iron, the stone, the glass, the paint, the various kinds of work in a dozen different advertisements, it may be; and the cost of such advertising is charged in the cost of the building or work. And so with forts; so with any other thing bought or used by the Government. Therefore to find out what the cost of public advertisements is you must overhaul the accounts of every public building and every public work and every expenditure for property or labor of the United States in the given year. So with land sales; so with a great many other things. The search for the cost of this expenditure for advertising would simply be endless.

I have had an estimate made by the Public Printer and he thinks that 5,000 copies of this may be got up weekly. For 1,000 copies the cost would be $1,060.40 a week. The whole cost of 5,000 copies ought to be not beyond $50,000 or $70,000 a year; and I have no doubt the present printing costs more than half a million—I mean outside the Public Printer.

Now there is another thing in this bill. All these copies of the laws, all these copies of all these orders are made prima facie evidence in every court officially; and a great deal of money will be saved to the people in that way.

This bill has been before the Judiciary Committee some three times. We have carefully examined it. It has been examined by the Public Printer; and while I do not claim for it perfection, I do claim that there is a very great deal of merit in the scheme, and it will save more money than has been done in any one matter that has come under my observation.

There is another provision. Every Department of the Government now orders what printing and binding it pleases; and you find nicely bound books distributed from the Departments by their officers that Congress never appropriated for. This says you must have it done by the Public Printer and the Public Printer cannot print anything that is not authorized by law.

I have one other thing to say about this. This country is the only civilized country in the world that has not got an official gazette where everything that pertains to the operations of the Government, all the acts and orders of the Government, can be found. The Official Gazette in England is a source of revenue to the government of £15,000 a year from subscriptions. I have no doubt that in one year, or two years at most, this will become a paying concern to the United States. Everybody wants it. Every contractor will want it; every Army officer will want it; every Navy officer will want it; every office-holder will want it; every merchant will want it, because all the orders and circulars for the collection of customs revenue he will be able to find here and nowhere else, all together, unless he goes to the Treasury for information.

Mr. BREWER. I understand the bill to provide that this publication shall be furnished to subscribers at the actual cost. How can it then become a source of profit?

Mr. BUTLER. For this reason, that it will be furnished at the actual cost and 10 per cent. profit, the same as other books.

Mr. O'NEILL. I rise to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts this question: the gentleman refers to the Official Gazette of England. I would like to ask him whether the English people are as great newspaper readers as the people of this country, and whether at last the information scattered through the hundreds of thousands of newspapers of this country cannot be got at easier than in any gazette that can be published?

Mr. BUTLER. The information is not scattered now. It cannot be scattered for the reason, as everybody knows, that a newspaper of large circulation cannot afford to take Government printing at Government rates.

Mr. O'NEILL. Am I not correct in understanding that there is a proposition now somewhere between the House and the Senate to regulate that so that the newspapers can take the advertising of the Government at a fair business profit?

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, yes; that was referred to our committee, and it was in that way we got jurisdiction of the subject. That is why I am here. I am glad to explain how that is. The newspapers propose we shall pay them commercial rates for advertising; that is to say we shall pay for giving the laws to the people the same price exactly that the merchant is willing to pay to advertise his goods in order to get sale for them. Congress has found that commercial rates mean exactly what the newspapers can get; and it is to meet that that we have reported this bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. Will the gentleman permit me another word? I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. O'NEILL. In our State and city governments there are certain methods of publication by posting in court-houses and court offices and so on for certain purposes. Now, in my opinion the public do not go to get their information in that way. They depend almost entirely upon the newspapers. The three or four hundred thousand newspapers that are issued every day in the city of Philadelphia and more in the larger city of New York, give the information to the people that they want easily and without trouble; and they take the newspapers and read them to get information of what is going on in public affairs. Now I do not think the gentleman's idea will reach what he wants in any convenient way for the people.

Mr. BUTLER. I am very sorry to differ with my friend from Pennsylvania. I seem to see his constituents in Philadelphia sitting down reading the advertisements in the newspapers and amusing themselves with that sort of light reading in the summer months. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'NEILL. The man in business who is seeking to find proposals for contracts for the departments of the Government is looking at the advertisements in the newspapers; and so is the man in the Army and so is the man in the Navy, they are looking at the newspapers for what concerns Army and Navy matters.

Mr. BUTLER. The answer to that is a very plain one. The man who wants to see the advertisements does not know in what newspaper to look for them, but the man who knows how to get a contract does know, and I tell you that this happened in this Government more than once: somebody sends a letter to the Department and inquires where is the advertisement for the work on such a public building, and the answer is sent back, "You had better subscribe for such a newspaper and you will find the advertisement there."

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question in reference to this bill?

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, yes.

Mr. CLYMER. Is this proposed publication to contain any other matter than that provided for by the bill?

Mr. BUTLER. Nothing whatever.

Mr. CLYMER. Is there anything in the bill to prohibit its containing other matter?

Mr. BUTLER. The bill says that "it shall contain only," &c.

Mr. CLYMER. No; the word "only" is not in.

Mr. BUTLER. Then you can put the word "only" in.

Mr. CLYMER. I trust the gentleman will so amend it.

Mr. BUTLER. That is what is meant by the bill. When a public officer is ordered to do anything we do not order him to do anything else.

I have now given all the explanation possible of this bill. It has been thoroughly examined, and I trust it will receive the favorable action of the House; but I am ready to answer any inquiries in reference to it that gentlemen desire to propound.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. Do I understand that the bill proposes to provide for the publication of the public laws of Congress?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir; and not only the public laws of Congress, but the decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. Do I understand that there is no law now which provides for the publication of the public laws except in the pamphlet form in which we know them?

Mr. BUTLER. This bill provides that all proclamations, executive orders from the President, and all acts and joint resolutions of Congress shall be printed in the gazette. That is the language of the bill.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. Allow me to ask the gentleman if there is any method now provided by law for the publication of the public laws of Congress except in the ordinary pamphlet form.

Mr. BUTLER. They may be published in the newspapers.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. Under what law?

Mr. BUTLER. Under an old law of many years' standing.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. But I understand that an appropriation for that purpose has been prohibited.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well; I hope so.

Mr. BUCKNER. Allow me to ask the gentleman one question, and it is how under the provisions of this bill does he expect any profit to the Government when the bill provides that this record shall be furnished at cost?

Mr. BUTLER. That means, under the law, at 10 per cent. more than cost; moreover it is a profit to the Government to get its work done in this way.

Mr. ATKINS. What will this work cost?

Mr. BUTLER. Between fifty and sixty thousand dollars a year.

Mr. BUCKNER. We shall save, then, the expense of publishing the laws in pamphlet form.

Mr. BUTLER. It can be done in this way.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I desire to say, in advocating the passage of this bill, that one of the great benefits that will follow from its passage will be that in each county there can be found copies of this record which will be prima facie evidence in any court.

Now, it may be the experience of members of Congress, and I know it is with many of them here, that we are constantly called upon to go to the Departments and get copies of orders, arbitrary rules made by the Departments, which are to be used in the various courts of justice thoughout the country, in courts of original jurisdiction and sometimes in the probate courts. Now, the provisions of this bill make this proposed official gazette prima facie evidence. It makes it evidence as to the decisions of the Supreme Court, and they will be sufficiently certified so that they may be read in the different courts, for two copies are to be deposited in each county in each State. It so fixes it that every attorney, every counselor or solicitor, may subscribe for it so that he may have it in his office, and so that he may be provided at little expense and trouble to himself with knowledge that he has to use monthly at least in his practice in the different courts of the United States and of the States.

Mr. ELAM. Will this dispense with the publication of the statutes in the present form?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Lawyers now can get possession of all this knowledge by subscribing to certain periodicals in Saint Louis, Chicago, Albany, and other parts of the country where they get the decisions of the circuit courts of the United States and the decisions of the Supreme Court merely in syllabus form.

This will be a great saving to the whole profession, to all the people of the country, because there are commercial men and business men who get the syllabus of these cases and study them up for their own benefit and become quite adepts in their own business. I believe that this will provide the best amount of knowledge for the business men of the country, and at the same time furnish it to them at only 10 per cent. above the actual cost to the Government.

Mr. BUTLER. I now yield a few minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL.]

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire but a moment. I am unable to see why this bill is not in the interest of good legislation. In the new States there is a very great difficulty in getting at the rulings of the General Land Office in relation to the homestead and pre-emption laws. There was a volume of those rulings prepared for publication, but the Committee on Printing of this Congress reported adversely upon the proposition, unwisely as I thought at the time. If this bill will provide that from week to week all the rulings of the General Land Office (I allude only to that branch of the Government now) can be published, it seems to me it will be of very great interest to all the people in the States of the West.

I desire to confirm one thing which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has said in regard to publications in the newspapers. I recollect that a few years ago a large quantity of Army clothing was to be sold in the State of Minnesota. It had in some way got there and was to be sold, a very large quantity of it. On a given morning the sale was to commence. The night before, certain gentlemen from Saint Louis arrived at Saint Paul ready to bid in the clothing that was to be sold. Not a man or a woman in the State of Minnesota knew anything about the sale that was to come off. It resulted in an immense loss to the Government, simply because the advertisement was for a week or two slipped into a Saint Louis newspaper, and the Saint Louis bidders were there while the Minnesota bidders knew nothing about that vast amount of clothing that was to be sold. That is one illustration.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Is it proposed that the publication of this journal shall supersede advertisements in all other papers?

Mr. BUTLER. It is.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. And there is to be no advertisement in any other paper?

Mr. BUTLER. None at all.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. That is a good thing.

Mr. BUTLER. All the people will know right where to look for information.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The fourth section of this bill provides that "any person desiring to obtain the Official Advertiser may subscribe for it, paying for the same in advance at a price equal to the cost to the United States of printing, paper, folding, and enveloping, which shall be sent to him through the mail free of charge." Now, how can the Government make any profit out of that?

Mr. BUTLER. Because the general law provides that any publication by the Government may be furnished at the cost of publication and 10 per cent. added.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. But this is a special act.

Mr. BUTLER. I am willing to have the gentleman move to insert "10 per cent. added."

Mr. HANNA. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. HANNA. In glancing over this bill this thought has struck me, whether or not it would be practicable to publish weekly the mass of information which this bill would seem to indicate is to be published. Would it not be more than you can get into any one weekly publication?

Mr. BUTLER. We have examined that matter thoroughly, and find that it will not amount to more than one of our thickest daily RECORDS. Take a day's proceedings when we speak all day and all night and get our speeches all in——

Mr. OLIVER. And get leave to print some.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, and get leave to print. That would make a larger publication than this will be in any week. I now call for a vote upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which this bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs upon the motion to recommit.

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw the motion to recommit, and I desire——

Mr. REAGAN. I want to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to recommit has been withdrawn.

Mr. ATKINS. I renew the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] to one thing. The House must commit this bill to some other committee than the Committee on the Judiciary. We have given it the best consideration we can give it; we have examined it as carefully as we can. I have some amendments here which I propose to bring immediately before the House. This bill has now been discussed. I can assure the gentleman that it is in the interest of economy, and the House never will be any better prepared to vote upon it than it is now. The very reason why I have taken this course is that I might avoid taking one of the two hours which would be given to the Committee on the Judiciary when they come to make their reports.

Mr. ATKINS. This is a bill which the House has not considered. The House has heard the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] it is true; but I doubt whether there are a dozen gentlemen in this House who have considered this bill before to-night. It is a very important bill. In my judgment, if passed, it will only result in enlarging the Government printing establishment.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no.

Mr. ATKINS. That is the effect of it. I believe the Government Printing Office should be cut down, rather than enlarged. I believe that the printing for the Departments should be let out by private contract. I believe that such a system would effect a saving of the public money. But if we are to swell the proportions of the Government Printing Office, then we must swell our expenditures. I hope, therefore, that the bill will either be recommitted or laid aside until gentlemen have had more time to consider the proposition.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it my fault, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen do not know what this bill is? It has been before the House on their files for three months.

Mr. ATKINS. How many bills are before the House that members have not considered at all? There are several thousand bills on our file.

Mr. BUTLER. When men will not do their duty why should they come here and ask somebody else to do it for them?

Mr. ATKINS. Has the gentleman from Massachusetts considered every bill before the House? He will not say that he has.

Mr. BUTLER. This bill was introduced, referred to the committee, and printed. It was then reported, recommitted, and reprinted. All has been done about it that can be done by anybody in the world. Now is it quite fair because gentlemen will not read it or consider it to come here and say, "We do not know anything about it?" Cannot the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] follow the lead of the Committee on the Judiciary quite as well as we follow the lead of the Committee on Appropriations? [Laughter.] We do not any of us know what these appropriation bills are, and the more we read them the less we find out. [Laughter.] If you read this bill you will find out what is in it.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. ATKINS to recommit the bill, there were—ayes 43, noes 95.

Mr. ATKINS. I raise the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. BUTLER. Let me say that in raising this point the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ATKINS] is setting me and everybody else a very bad example. We may go against the appropriation bills when there is not a quorum.

Mr. ATKINS. An important bill like this should not be considered without a quorum.

No quorum having voted, tellers were ordered; and Mr. BUTLER and Mr. ATKINS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 34, noes not counted.

So the motion to recommit was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I now ask that the Clerk read the amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Clerk read the first amendment, as follows:

At the end of line 50 add the following:

And the reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court shall forthwith, after any decision of that court shall have been announced and printed for the use of the court, prepare an abstract of the facts and points in the case sufficient to the understanding thereof (unless the same shall appear in the opinion of the court) together with that opinion, and give the same forthwith to the Public Printer to be published in the Official Gazette.

Mr. FOSTER. I am very much interested in the discussion of this bill, and it seems like a measure of reform, one that ought to pass. But there is rather an ominous silence on the part of the other members of the Judiciary Committee. I would like to hear from them on this subject, as I understand the bill has been examined by them three or four times.

Mr. EDEN. The gentleman from Ohio seems to be in doubt whether this is a measure of economy. It proposes to enlarge the dimensions of the Government printing establishment, which, as everybody knows, is an exceedingly cheap institution; and as a matter of course the more we enlarge it the cheaper it will be.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman is a member of the Judiciary Committee, I have called on him; if he is not, I did not.

Mr. BUTLER. When an appropriation bill is under the charge of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] would he think it complimentary if I should get up and say, "I would like to know whether the gentleman is speaking for the Appropriation Committee"——

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps I would not.

Mr. BUTLER. Especially if I had not been in to hear him, but had just come from dinner. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, I have heard every word the gentleman said and have been greatly interested. The reason I want to hear from the committee is this: there is a rumor going around the Hall that they have not agreed to this proposition.

Mr. BUTLER. That rumor is unworthy of the men who originated it and unworthy to be repeated by the gentleman. I say that the committee did agree to this report. I have said so in the presence of the committee.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, members of the Judiciary Committee have intimated to him that the bill never received the sanction of the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. Let the chairman of the committee [Mr. KNOTT] speak, if it is necessary I shall call a voucher. It may be that the gentleman from Ohio will need to call a voucher before he dies.

Mr. FOSTER. I should be glad to hear from the committee, as it has gone so far.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, as one of the Judiciary Committee I desire to say the bill now before the House has my hearty approbation. I believe it to be an economical measure. I believe, in the first place, that the publication of the official advertisements of this Government in the manner proposed can be done much cheaper in the Public Printing Office, through the medium of a gazette such as is contemplated by this bill, than it can be done through the newspapers of the country according to their customary rates for advertising. I believe in the second place that information can be more generally diffused in the manner proposed in this bill than by the plan ordinarily proposed in public advertisements for the Government.

Gentlemen who have paid attention to the details of the bill will find that a certain number of copies of this official gazette is to be distributed through the agency of the various representatives of the people upon this floor. A copy is to be deposited in the office of the secretary of state of every State in the Union. A copy, if I am not mistaken, is to be deposited in the office of the clerk of every district court of the United States. And, more than all that, a copy is to be deposited in the office of every county clerk in every county throughout the United States.

In this manner it occurs to me information such as is sought to be given through the instrumentality of these advertisements can be more universally disseminated and can reach more certainly those parties who are interested in these advertisements than according to the plan now pursued by publishing advertisements in the newspapers of the United States.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to ask him how much this will cost the government per annum—one for each county court in the United States and one for each secretary of state and other copies elsewhere?

Mr. KNOTT. I have made no estimate——

Mr. ATKINS. Has the committee made any estimate?

Mr. KNOTT. I have myself made no estimate of what it would cost, but I feel confident the cost would be less than that which is now incurred by the Government of the United States in public advertisements. The gentleman who reported the bill by the authority of the Judiciary Committee has been at the pains of ascertaining the facts in that regard, and upon the statistics he will be able to lay before the House I rely for the statement I make, that I believe it would be far more economical than the plan at present pursued by the Government.

I am asked whether this bill is reported to the House by the unanimous voice of the Committee on the Judiciary. So far as I know, sir, that is the fact. If there was, there was not more than one dissenting voice; but I do not believe there was one dissenting voice to the proposition to report the bill to the House. Gentlemen may have reserved the right to vote on the bill as they saw proper when it got to the House, but I think I am violating no confidence of the committee when I say it was by the unanimous consent of that committee the bill was reported here by the gentleman from Massachusetts If I am wrong in that, some of my colleagues on the committee are at liberty to take the opportunity to correct me.

Mr. MORRISON. Does the gentleman say the bill was considered and approved by the committee?

Mr. KNOTT. So far as that is concerned I will only say what I have already said, that it was unanimous with perhaps one exception, and I do not know there was a solitary exception in authorizing the gentleman from Massachusetts to report the bill to the House.

Mr. KENNA. With the recommendation that it do pass?

Mr. KNOTT. I say perhaps gentlemen reserved to themselves the right to vote as they saw proper when it came before the House.

Mr. KENNA. How many members of the committee reserved the right to vote as they pleased?

Mr. KNOTT. I do not know any did. When a bill is reported to the House the presumption is it was by the authority of the committee, and I take it it would be exceedingly ungracious to catechise members of a committee as to how many were in favor of a bill and how many reserved the right to vote on it and all that sort of thing. When all consented to the proposition it should be reported.

I am speaking for myself, and not for any of my colleagues on the committee at all. Speaking for myself, I have simply to say that in my opinion the measure will be one of economy, and it will be one through which and by which a more general dissemination of information may be obtained than by the present system of the various Departments of the Government employing newspapers at their own rates to publish advertisements in public localities which perhaps are read by one out of a hundred of those who are interested in the subject-matter of the advertisements.

Mr. KENNA. As the gentleman from Kentucky has misunderstood me, I hope I will have an opportunity to set myself right. I asked the gentleman the question as to how many members of the committee reserved the right to vote on the measure in the House as they saw fit, not with a view to reflect on the gentleman or any member of the committee or to question the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts. But from the statement of the gentleman who has just occupied the floor that gentlemen on the committee reserved the right to vote as they pleased I infer that the committee had authorized the bill to be reported without recommendation; and I put the question with the view of ascertaining that fact. I see no reason why a member cannot ask a question on this floor for information which he may very much need simply because he may belong to one or another committee of this House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I had intended to say nothing upon this question. But the Committee on the Judiciary seem to be called to give their recollections for the information of the House, and I will say that so far as my recollection serves me the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has pursued directly the course which he was instructed to pursue by the committee; that is, he was not instructed, but leave was given him to report the bill, to make a motion to recommit the bill to the committee, and then to enter a motion to reconsider, so as to have it under his control at all times. My recollection further is that no definite vote was taken upon the merits of the bill in committee. For myself I reserved the right to vote as I thought proper, and I shall vote in the negative.

Mr. BUTLER. I now ask that the amendments be read, and then I shall move the previous question.

Mr. McMAHON. Before the previous question is moved I desire to say a word. I want this bill to be determined, as it ought to be, upon its own merits. If the recommendation of the Judiciary Committee for or against it is worth anything, the bill has not got that recommendation for or against it, and any gentleman who states that it has I think misapprehends the situation.

The gentleman from Massachusetts reported this bill to the committee and was authorized to report it to the House for the purpose of having it printed and recommitted. When he entered the motion to reconsider, that he did it of his own motion and without any instruction from the committee. When the committee subsequently came to consider the question, the notice was first given to us that the motion to reconsider had been entered, and the gentleman from Massachusetts then stated he had the bill in such a shape—which was true—that he could bring it up at any time.

Mr. KENNA. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. McMAHON. Let me finish my statement first. Then the question came up in the Judiciary Committee, what should be done with it. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] was one of the most strenuous opponents of this bill, and never gave his adhesion to it under any circumstances. My recollection is, but I will not be very sure of it, that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] opposed it. I certainly never gave my adhesion to the bill, for the simple reason that it was so complicated in some of its provisions that I could not say whether the system it would introduce would be more economical than the old system. Now, the question came up in the committee what should be done with it. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] raised a disturbance in the committee. [Laughter.] He claimed that the motion to reconsider had been entered without authority.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. It is that it is not in order for the gentleman to reveal differences and other matters that take place in the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCMAHON] will proceed in order.

Mr. BUTLER. If it was not that I am under trial I should say that this telling of what was done in committee is something that has never been done before and I hope will not be done again while I am here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order having been made the Chair declines to hear any more of what took place in committee.

Mr. McMAHON. Is all that has been told as to what took place in committee ruled out?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It ought to be.

Mr. McMAHON. Therefore the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts that he was authorized to report the bill goes out.

Mr. BUTLER. It is proper to state what was the action of the committee, but not to state what was said by A, B, or C, members of the committee.

Mr. McMAHON. Who is the mouth-piece of the committee to state its action?

Mr. BUTLER. The mouth-piece of the committee is the member who is authorized to report the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair insists that this discussion of what took place in committee shall not go further.

Mr. McMAHON. I have no opinion on this bill for or against it, and therefore I do not propose to vote for a new measure as against the old established practice until I have had a chance to examine it. I do not mean to say that the bill has not been discussed somewhat in the committee, but it has never received that discussion in the committee that a bill should receive. I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker. I did not mean to say that, but we certainly never did recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I call the previous question on the bill and the pending amendments.

Mr. KENNA. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KENNA. If I am not mistaken, it is the right of a member on this floor to know when a measure comes before this House whether the recommendation of the committee reporting it is in favor of its passage or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the gentleman's privileged question. It is not a privileged question at all. The question before the House is on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CLYMER. I desire to know whether all the amendments proposed by the committee, have been read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

Mr. CLYMER. Then I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to allow me to offer this amendment, to insert after the word "contain" in line 7 of the first section, the words "the following matter and no other."

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I will allow the amendment to be read, but I cannot agree to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to know whether the gentleman from Massachusetts intends to yield for the offering of further amendments, or does he insist upon the previous question?

Mr. BUTLER. I am willing to admit the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I will hear it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move to insert in line 3 of section 4, after the word "equal," the words "to 10 per cent. in addition."

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me to offer my amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I will yield to the gentleman to have his amendment read for information, but I cannot agree to his amendment.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The amendment I propose is, on page 6 of the bill, in the second line of section 8, to strike out the words, "or advertising;" so that it will read, "no letter-press printing, or binding of letter-press printing, shall be done," &c.

I desire to say one word only in regard to that amendment. It is proposed to take the whole advertising of the Government, which is now given out by the Departments throughout the country, and concentrate it in Washington City. When we advertise for any material needed in New York City we give the advertisement to the New York papers, and when we advertise for material needed in the West we put the advertisement in the Western papers. Now it is proposed to take the business away from the localities where the supplies may be needed and put it into a little paper to be published here, which is to be filed in certain places. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will strike out the words "or advertising."

Mr. BUTLER. I cannot yield for that amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; being first upon the amendments reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The first amendment reported by the committee was to insert after line 50, of section 1, the words:

And the reporter of decisions of the Supreme Court shall forthwith, after any decision of that court shall have been announced and printed for the use of the court, prepare an abstract of the facts and points in the case sufficient to the understanding thereof, (unless the same shall appear in the opinion of the court,) together with its opinion, and give the same forthwith to the Public Printer, to be published in the Official Gazette.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was to add to section 1 the following:

And it shall be the duty of each officer of the United States, having official matter hereinbefore named to be published, to cause the same forthwith to be transmitted to the Public Printer, to be published in the said Gazette.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was to insert in each of the lines 5 and 7 of section 2, after the word "advertisements," the words "and other matter to be published;" so that it will read:

The orders and advertisements issuing from the several Departments shall be inserted in said Official Advertiser under separate heads of the Department from which, or under the authority of which, or any officer of which such orders are issued, the orders and advertisements and other matter to be published under the head of each Department to be put together and so arranged that the orders and advertisements, and other matter to be published, of each Department can be furnished separately when called for, as hereinafter provided; all of which publications shall be official, and shall be so deemed and held to be for all purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was to insert in line 10 of section 6, after the word "Territory," the words "two copies to the county clerk's office of each county or parish of each State and Territory, to be preserved in the records of said office."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was to amend section 6 by inserting in line 11, after the word "library," the words "and in said offices;" so that it will read:

And said copies shall be preserved in said library and in said offices, and said official personages receiving the same, to be open to inspection at all proper and reasonable times by all persons desiring so to do.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was to insert in line 8, section 10, after the word "Government," the words "or from private subscription;" so that it will read:

The Public Printer is required to make a report to the House of Representatives, on or before the first Monday of December of each year, containing a just and true account of the whole number of said Official Advertiser printed and furnished by him, to whom furnished, the cost of the same, and of any money that he may have received for the same, specifying the amounts received from any Department, bureau, or officer of the Government, or from private subscription, for the fiscal year last ended; also an estimate of the cost to the Government of publishing and distributing said Official Advertiser for the next succeeding fiscal year, or part thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred upon Mr. CLYMER's amendment, to insert in section 1, line 7, after the word "contain," the words "the following matter, and no other;" so that it will read:

That the Public Printer is authorized and directed to print and publish a weekly paper, to be designated The Official Advertiser of the United States, uniform in size and type with and upon the like paper that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is now printed, which paper shall contain the following matter, and no other.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, to insert in line 3 of section 4, after the word "equal," the words "to 10 per cent. in addition;" so that it will read:

Any person desiring to obtain The Official Advertiser may subscribe for it, paying for the same in advance at a price equal to 10 per cent. in addition to the cost to the United States of the printing, paper, folding, and enveloping, which shall be sent to him through the mail free of charge, or he may subscribe for any part of The Official Advertiser containing the advertisements and orders issuing from any one or more Departments, to be paid for and forwarded in like manner.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the law now I think; at any rate it only adds 10 per cent. to the cost to the subscribers.

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division ayes 97, noes not counted.

Mr. BUTLER. The pending amendments having all been disposed of, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the fourth line of section 6, after the words "United States" the words "and one copy to each Member and Delegate of the House of Representatives and Senator of the United States."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can only be done by unanimous consent as the bill is under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. EDEN. I object.

The question was upon ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to say that my vote upon this bill will be controlled by the consideration of economy. I desire to ask the gentlemen from Massachusetts——[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not now in order.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDEN, and Mr. HARRIS of Virginia, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 49 in the affirmative; more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 109, nays 77, not voting 105; as follows:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I now desire to call up——

Mr. SPARKS. I rise to make a privileged report from a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That report is in order at this time.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4549) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 15, 25, 30, 37, 51, and 62.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 24, 26, 27, 28, 29, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 44, 46, 48, 49, 50, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 59, 60, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 9, with an amendment as follows:

Substitute for the words proposed to be stricken out the following: "at the Abiqnin agency, at the rate of $1,200, during the continuance of said agency."

And the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out "one" and insert "three."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

SERVICE OF PROCESS IN INTERPLEADED CASES.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I ask leave to call up the bill (S. No. 1241) to provide for the service of process in cases of interpleader in the courts of the United States. It is not a bill that there will be any objection to by anybody.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have no objection to the bill, but it will be recollected that the resolution in regard to the Treasury discrepancies committee is the unfinished business this morning.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That resolution will require discussion. I do not think this bill will take any time, if the Senator from West Virginia will give way about five minutes.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will give way one minute. I notice the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is not in his seat. As soon as he comes in I shall ask the Senate to take up the resolution that was under discussion when the morning hour ended yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia will have to move to take it up; it is not unfinished business.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1241) to provide for the service of process in cases of interpleader in the courts of the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that in cases and on bills of interpleader in circuit courts of the United States, or district courts having the powers of a circuit court, where any of the parties do not reside or cannot be found in the district where the suit is pending, the process of such court may extend to and be served in any other district; such service to be made by the marshal of the district where made, or other proper person; and injunctions in such suits may extend as well to proceedings in State courts as to those in the courts of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The object of this bill is where there is a fund sued for by various parties in different States, to let one of the courts get possession of all the parties and adjudicate the rights between them. I will illustrate. A person in Kentucky insures his life for the benefit of his wife in a company in New Jersey. The man dies; but before he dies he transfers this policy to somebody in the State of New York, in fraud of his wife. The case may be assumed. The man having died, the wife brings suit upon the policy. The party who holds the policy in the State of New York brings suit also. The insurance company is perfectly willing to pay the money, acknowledges its obligation to pay the money to either one or the other. Now, we should provide the opportunity in such a case as that for service of process in a process of interpleader to bring all the parties into court; and the court that first gets possession of the suit should have the opportunity of getting all the parties in interest before it to adjudicate the matter and dispose of it at once.

There are two amendments to the bill which have been suggested and which I think ought to be made. In line 9, I move to strike out the word "proper" before the word "person," and after the word "person" to insert "legally authorized to serve process;" so as to read:

Such service to be made by the marshal of the district where made, or other person legally authorized to serve process.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I have been directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to move to amend the proviso by striking out in lines 11 and 12, the words "Provided, however, That" and inserting "But," and at the end of the bill to strike out the period and insert these words after a comma:

And in the latter case the interpleader suit shall be commenced in the district in which such proceedings are depending.

So that if amended the proviso would read:

But nothing herein contained shall authorize any such suit to be brought in any district other than a district in which one or more of the claimants required to interplead resides or has commenced proceedings to prosecute the claim in question, and in the latter case the interpleader suit shall be commenced in the district in which such proceedings are depending.

The object of that is simply to require that the party who wishes to interplead shall do it in the district where the suit has been commenced.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Illinois whether under this bill it is not possible to practice great fraud or great injustice upon plaintiffs. Here is a plaintiff resident in California with a claim against a life-insurance company or a fire-insurance company or a marine-insurance company established in New York or New England. The policy in almost all the States of the Union is established that companies doing business of that kind in the State are bound to have agents or attorneys authorized to receive the service of process. In other words, it is made a condition of prosecuting this kind of business in the various States that the company prosecuting it shall hold itself liable to be sued in the State where it effects a policy. Suppose under this bill an insurance company in New York or Boston is doing business in a distant part of the country, why can it not get some claimant in the State where it resides or in the distant State to make claim to the fund in case of a loss and compel the plaintiff, the party insured, to go half way across the continent to prosecute his suit, by getting up an interpleader suit?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It seems to me that is an extreme case. You cannot pass any bill that will prevent men from committing gross frauds; but this bill is not designed for any purpose of that sort at all. If suit is first commenced in one State the bill is simply to allow the court there to get all the parties in. For instance, suppose an insurance company insures in the State of California where the party resides and another person claims the fund. In that case the bill is simply to enable the court to get that other person into the court, and dispose of the case there. There have been several such cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, in which they have been very much embarrassed.

Mr. HOAR. The answer of the honorable member of the Judiciary Committee does not meet my question. He says that it is a good thing in a suit of interpleader to have all the parties before the court, and where the parties are residents in different districts I agree that it is necessary to have an authority whereby the process may be served beyond the district where the suit is pending if that can be accomplished without a greater evil. My question is not whether that is not a good object to be accomplished, but whether the bill is not open to a very strong practical objection, and that is that it enables a class of debtors to which of course the whole bill is intended chiefly to apply, the case of insurance companies——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Oh, it is intended to apply in railroad cases and in other cases.

Mr. HOAR. But that of insurance companies is the commonest class of cases. In other words, it enables a debtor to bring his creditor, under the guise of a bill of interpleader, into the State where a fictitious suit may be instituted. It seems to me that that is a very strong practical difficulty.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The last clause of the bill, which was amended just now, is to compel the party to interplead after the first proceedings are commenced, so as to relieve any difficulty of that kind. The bill has received the approbation of Judge Strong.

Mr. HOAR. That is very strong argument; but the question is for it to receive the approbation of the Senate. Of course the source from which this bill comes is very important.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I am not saying that. I am simply saying that if we pass any bill upon the subject at all, this bill has been fully considered.

Mr. HOAR. I think it is a proper, practical question which I put, and that is whether this bill sufficiently guards claimants, creditors, who are entitled to sue their debtors in the district where they reside, from being called into other and distant districts on pretended bills of interpleader. That is the question that I desire to have answered, and I think it is a question fit to be answered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it is, too, but I think a little consideration by my distinguished friend from Massachusetts will convince him——

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say to the Senator that I have not had an opportunity to give any consideration to the bill; and I ask the question of the committee who have considered it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A little consideration will convince him that the danger to which he alludes is trifling compared to the absolute injustice that is now perpetrated, not only upon debtors who are willing to pay, but upon the true creditor who wishes to get his pay, because the debtor says "I will not pay until this outstanding claim that is made against me by another party is disposed of, because I cannot be exposed to the risk of paying twice; but the moment you get that disposed of, then I am ready to pay." Consequently what has been the result in one or two cases that have been brought before the attention of the committee, now existing? One in particular that is in my mind, is the case of a widow lady of great merit in a State of this Union who is absolutely kept out of $5,000 that unquestionably clearly belongs to her on a policy made for her benefit that the company is perfectly willing to pay, perfectly responsible; it brings the money into court, but she cannot get her money because there is a claimant under her husband in his life-time in another State, where neither the State court nor the Federal court in the State where this widow lives can get jurisdiction of the person, the Federal court already has jurisdiction of the subject on account of the different residence of the parties. Now what are you going to do or propose to do in such a case?

Now in respect of the fraudulent contrivance that a debtor, be it a corporation or whatever, might get up in order to vex the party and have a fictitious suit brought against him, it would be death to an interpleader bill because the very foundation of an interpleader bill must be that the party who commenced the interpleader, the debtor, the stake-holder, must state in his bill, and I think according to the rules of practice he must accompany it by an affidavit that the bill is brought through no collusion or contrivance or understanding with either of the claimants and comes in, independent of them both, in his own right. Now, we propose by this amendment to say that wherever either of these two claimants has first begun the suit, in that district the Federal court if it has jurisdiction at all may proceed; we confer no jurisdiction; it is merely a question of the service of process. I think that is as safe as you can get it. Undoubtedly the course of justice may be perverted by a debtor, just as it may be now in many instances, getting up a fictitious proceeding somewhere in order to harass other people; but that is so rare, particularly in respect of interpleaders, which would present a case of perjury on the face of it to begin with, that I do not think the danger is at all commensurate with the benefit to be obtained in the other respects. I submit that to my friend.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the city of which I am a resident was swept over by a fire, burned out in the heart of all its business and manufacturing center. That was in 1854, and I believe that out of the insurance which was upon that vast manufacturing property the owners did not collect 10 per cent., and the reason was that they were insured largely in foreign insurance companies, insurance companies doing business in other States; and those insurance companies, by their by-laws and the legal skill that they had called into their service, had carried the art of cheating parties insured out of their insurance to a science; and the extent of the foresight and ingenuity which they had manifested in this thing if applied to any ordinary business or the invention of mechanical appliances for a useful purpose would almost have revolutionized the industries of the country.

Now the States have been compelled—and there is nothing to which our business men and our manufacturers are more alive than to the preservation of these safeguards—to establish the most careful safeguards in regard to the business of fire insurance, and to some extent of marine insurance, though not so much; and so in regard to the business of life insurance. On the solvency and honesty of these life-insurance companies depends the security which many men have for wife and children being provided for when they are taken away.

In nearly every State of the Union there is a provision making it highly penal to enter into the business of life or fire insurance without an arrangement of a bond filed with the treasurer of the State to secure all judgments in the State and the maintenance of an attorney or agent authorized to accept service of process in the State.

This bill seems to me to be open to the objection that fictitious interpleader suits can be got up in those cases in any other State in the Union, and a person to whom the right of suit in his own State has been secured by the State law existing at the time he entered into his contract driven to go to any other State in the Union at the pleasure of the debtor, when such a fictitious suit may have been instituted. I know that the formal affidavit that there is no collusion as required in all interpleader suits; but it seems to me that that is not a trifling or an imaginary difficulty selected by mere ingenuity. It is a resort which these insurance companies will be sure to avail themselves of and to understand the moment this bill becomes a law.

Though I have some experience in this general class of questions, which all professional men have, I know the very much greater authority of the committee from which this bill has come; and I would suggest that a very important security might be added by giving an authority to the court where the interpleader is tried to transfer the proceedings from one district to another in which the parties may reside, when the interests of justice shall in the opinion of the judge seem to require, by a certificate, as is done in England by transferring a bankruptcy trial from one county to another.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There would be no objection to that except the objection that might arise in a given case, and would very often, on the Constitution of the United States. You see the jurisdiction of the court, its right to hear an interpleader at all when it has got the parties, depends upon the Constitution; that is to say, in respect of all the class of subjects in general that we are now speaking of, it depends on the citizenship of the parties. Consequently a suit very often cannot be commenced by interpleader in the State where it might be most convenient to the parties to try it or to two of them, for instance, in the very State of which the company is a citizen. There that company could never sue in the courts of the United States in a case of interpleader in an ordinary sense, because it is not anything that arises under an act of Congress, and the jurisdiction must depend upon citizenship, and the very citizenship of a stakeholder in that case would oust the jurisdiction. Just so if one of the claimants to the fund resided in the same State with himself; but if both the claimants to the fund reside in the same State and the stakeholder reside in another, then the suit can be brought. But so far as the Constitution will allow it, to authorize the court in a case of interpleader to transmit the case, in its discretion, to a more convenient district where one or the other party resides, I should for one certainly not have the least objection to; but practically when you consider the extreme narrowness of the cases of interpleader at all, a case of mere stakeholding where the holder of the fund has no claim to it and says he has none, it is not necessary to make provision on the subject. It is a case where the very insurance company that files a bill of interpleader is obliged to state and swear that it is willing and ready to pay, that it has not any defense upon the policy, but only wishes to find out which of two persons, the original holder of the policy or an assignee, is entitled to the money, they both claiming it. So my friend will see how very narrow the case is, and that an insurance company that wanted to get rid of paying would be the last party that would attempt to file an interpleader, because it has to give up formally under oath all its own claim or defense to the payment of the money, to bring the money into court, or to offer it, one of the two, and to offer it means to bring it.

Mr. HOAR. No, I do not think that is very important to the point. I do not understand that there is any obligation to bring the money into court.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is an obligation to tender it, say he is ready to pay it, and thereupon the court may make an order at once "if you say you are ready to pay, bring in the money."

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. He must bring in the money, or the court would not allow the interpleader.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He must make tender of the money. I do not claim that it is necessary that he should pick up his pile of greenbacks or his bag of silver dollars and lay them down in the clerk's office the moment he files the bill; but he must state in the bill, which must be under oath and which must reject under oath all claim to the money, all pretense of collusion with either of the parties, and must say, "I am now ready to pay over this money."

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. And the court can compel him to pay it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That being the state of the case, I submit that an insurance company that wanted to cheat its creditors would be the very last company that would ever experiment under this bill. The Senator will see that we now provide by this amendment that the suit must be brought where one of the parties lives and where the party lives who has first commenced the proceeding. In nine hundred and ninety-nine thousand cases out of a million, if ever there could be so many, certainly in ninety-nine in a hundred the party who first commences the suit is the man who makes the first claim on the policy and the real man, if there be a real man; and the insurance company would hardly go and get somebody through perjury to bring a suit against itself as a claimant to a fund which it knew did not belong to it in order to get jurisdiction if the other party should sue somewhere else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask whether it is intended to apply to anything but cases of interpleader? The language seems to be rather general.

That in cases and on bills of interpleader in circuit courts, &c.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The word "cases" was used from the circumstances that all the rules in equity in the Federal courts are subject to the regulation of the Supreme Court of the United States. As my friend knows, under their present rules a bill is the name of the particular thing that must be brought; but if the Supreme Court should change its rules so that an interpleader case might be instituted by a petition instead of by a bill, the point was to cover that. If the Senator thinks there is any serious doubt about it, I shall not object to striking out "cases."

Mr. TELLER. I think some question may arise whether it does not apply to something else. Say "on all bills of interpleader;" and if the Supreme Court changes its rules so that "bill" means something else, that will follow.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I hope the Senate will not strike out the word "cases," but will strike out "bills" so as to say "that in cases of interpleader."

Mr. TELLER. I will make the motion in that way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will make it clear. Strike out the words "and on bills;" so as to read "in cases of interpleader."

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I will accept that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this amendment? The Chair hears none and it is agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TREASURY DISCREPANCIES COMMITTEE.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to proceed with the consideration of Senate bill No. 1060.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It will be recollected by the Senator from Kansas that I gave notice that as soon as the bill of the Senator from Illinois was disposed of I should ask the Senate to take up the resolution in regard to the Treasury accounts committee. I will say to the Senator that there is no disagreement on the resolution, and it will only be called up and passed.

Mr. PLUMB. If there will be no delay, I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia asks for the present consideration of a resolution which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution reads:

Resolved, That the select committee to investigate the finance reports, books, and accounts of the Treasury Department, appointed under resolution of the Senate of November 19, 1877, in addition to the powers conferred by said resolution, have leave to continue its investigation and sit during the vacation or recess of the Senate.

An amendment is pending to strike out the words "and sit," and to add the words "so far as to continue the examination of books in the several Departments of the Government."

Mr. ALLISON. I propose to modify my amendment so as merely to strike out the words "and sit," and withdraw the latter clause. I do this after consultation with the chairman of the committee, with the understanding that the committee itself will not be called here by the chairman unless we find it convenient to come. In other words, the sessions of the committee are to be in accordance with an understanding if there are any such sessions.

Mr. MORRILL. If that is satisfactory to the Senator from Iowa, I certainly shall not object; but it seems to me that it only prevents this committee from being a sedentary committee, and provides that they shall be a standing committee and continue their investigation; but if the Senator from Iowa is satisfied with it, I shall have no objection. I am satisfied they will not continue business long unless they can sit.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to my friend that I do not think there will be any trouble with reference to this.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. With the explanation the Senator from Iowa has given to the members of the committee, I am well satisfied that the words "and sit" ought to be stricken from my resolution, with the understanding that the latter part of the amendment is withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment as modified, to strike out the words "and sit."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

HEAD-STONES FOR SOLDIERS' GRAVES.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1060.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1060) directing the Secretary of War to erect head-stones over the graves of soldiers interred in the Cemetery at Mound City, Kansas.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu the following:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to erect head-stones over the graves of soldiers who served in the regular or volunteer Army of the United States during the war for the Union, and who have been buried in private village or city cemeteries, in the same manner as provided by the law of March 3, 1873, for those interred in national military cemeteries; and for this purpose, and for the expenses incident to such work, so much of the appropriation of $1,000,000, made in the act above mentioned, as has not been expended, and as may be necessary, is hereby made available.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not the least objection to that; I only want to suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that inasmuch as this is an expenditure and an act to be done in respect of the graves of those whose relatives in a great many instances have buried them themselves, this act in these private cemeteries ought to be with the consent of the relatives, if there be any, and of the authorities having charge of the cemeteries.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not know that there is any objection to that suggestion, but I presume that as so much time has elapsed since these parties were buried it may be safely assumed that the relatives have relinquished any intention or disposition to control the bodies. This matter has been brought to the attention of Congress by a memorial from the General Assembly of the State of Pennsylvania, as well as by various private petitions; and, as the Senate well remember, there was read in the hearing of the Senate a few days ago a letter from the Quartermaster-General, stating that there were seventeen thousand of these soldiers so buried, and that it was necessary that this work should be undertaken at once, in order to preserve the personal identity of the individual soldier, because the wooden monuments which marked their resting-places were decaying. That makes the necessity for the urgency of this measure. Before we shall meet again no doubt this identity would be lost to a great extent.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to suggest to the Senator who reports this amendment an addition to the section something like this:

The Secretary of War be directed to preserve among the records of the Department the names and places of burial of the soldiers for whom such head-stones are appropriated.

It would be a very important public record for genealogical and other historical purposes.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to an amendment of that character. I understand that that already has been done by a general law.

Mr. HOAR. If there is such a law, that is sufficient.

Mr. PLUMB. This corresponds specifically with the recommendation of the Department in reference to this particular subject.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator is sure there is such a law now, I will not press my suggestion of amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I am entirely willing that the Senator from Massachusetts, in order to make that sure, shall so amend the bill as to cover that point.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kansas if this bill embraces burials in all cemeteries?

Mr. PLUMB. Private, village, and city cemeteries.

Mr. McDONALD. Organized cemeteries?

Mr. PLUMB. All other cemeteries than the national military cemeteries, which are already provided for. It is to cover all those not provided for now by law in the national military cemeteries.

Mr. HOAR. I move to add to the amendment of the committee:

The Secretary of War shall cause to be preserved in the records of his Department the names and places of burial of all soldiers for whom such head-stones shall have been erected by the authority of this or any former act.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PLUMB, the title was amended to read: "A bill authorizing the Secretary of War to erect head-stones over the graves of Union soldiers who have been interred in private, village, or city cemeteries."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3558) to change the time of holding the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the western district of Michigan; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. No. 396) to amend section 2464 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the cultivation of timber on the public domain, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PETER D. WIGGINTON of California, Mr. T. M. PATTERSON of Colorado, and Mr. FRANK WELCH of Nebraska, managers at the conference on its part.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 4549) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

The message also returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (H. R. No. 4245) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint James Shields, of Missouri, a brigadier-general in the United States Army on the retired list.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 933) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to refund a certain tax erroneously collected; and

A bill (S. No. 1021) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands.

JOHN C. BIRDSELL.

Mr. McDONALD. I rise for the purpose of moving the present consideration of the bill (S. No. 501) for the relief of John C. Birdsell.

The bill was read for information.

Mr. WITHERS. The morning hour has almost expired. That bill cannot pass without objection and debate, I know.

Mr. McDONALD. If the bill can be taken up at the close of morning business to-morrow I am willing it shall go over now.

Mr. WITHERS. I shall be compelled to oppose the passage of the bill, and others coincide in this opinion.

Mr. McDONALD. I do not desire the bill to pass without consideration. I am willing it shall be fully considered.

Mr. INGALLS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the unfinished business of yesterday will now be taken up.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3658) to change the time of holding the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the western district of Michigan was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COMPLETION OF WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. DAWES, Mr. INGALLS, and Mr. EUSTIS managers on the part of the Senate at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 152) to enable the joint commission to carry into effect the act of Congress providing for the completion of the Washington Monument.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of D. B. Randall be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion of Mr. BURNSIDE, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Marie Barton Greene be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3259) providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to the second section of the amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia, after the word "per annum," in line 28, to insert:

And shall, before entering upon the duties of the office, each give bond in the sum of $50,000, with surety as required by existing law.

Mr. INGALLS. Let me state in a few words the object of this amendment to those who have not heard it read. It proposes to compel the commissioners of the District appointed from civil life to enter into bond in the sum of $50,000 for the faithful discharge of their duties. I stated yesterday, and repeat this morning, that under the provisions of this bill the commissioners have no charge whatever of the finances of the District. The taxes that are collected are paid into the Treasury of the United States, and they are disbursed upon the warrants of the commissioners only upon itemized vouchers duly certified, and these vouchers must be countersigned by the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to ask a question.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. I ask whether in fact under the proposed law the commissioners have more or less control of the finances than the commissioners have under the existing law?

Mr. INGALLS. If under the existing law they have anything to do with the finances, under this new law they must have much less, for they have nothing except simply to disburse them upon warrants countersigned by the First Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. HOWE. As a matter of fact the commissioners now give bond?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The act of 1874, if Senators will allow me to read it, provides—

Said commissioners shall each, before entering upon the discharge of his duties, take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and to faithfully discharge the duties imposed upon him by law; and shall each give bond in the penal sum of $50,000, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office.

Mr. INGALLS. Under this bill even the estimates of taxation are required to be submitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury for approbation; and it would be just as reasonable to require the President of the United States or a Senator or Representative in Congress to give a bond as these commissioners of the District. They are cabined, cribbed, and confined in every particular except as to simple executive duties. I hope that the amendment will not prevail. It seems to attach a condition to the acceptance of this office that really ought not to exist, for there is no pecuniary responsibility whatever.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the bill before the Senate in section 2, on page 2, provides for the appointment of three commissioners, who, from and after "the 1st day of July, 1878, shall exercise all the powers and authority now vested in the commissioners of said District, except as are hereinafter limited." By the law of June 20, 1874, three commissioners were appointed with power and authority as set forth in the second section of that act. There is a substantial description of the duties of these commissioners, and there is nothing in the present law that substantially changes the character of those duties. There are changes; there are some limitations; but there is nothing that in substance changes the character of the duties of the commissioner under the law of 1874 and the proposed law of 1878. The second section of the act of 1874 provides:

Said commissioners shall each before entering upon the discharge of his duties take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and to faithfully discharge the duties imposed upon him by law; and shall each give bond in the penal sum of $50,000, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office; and shall each receive for his services a compensation at the rate of $5,000 per annum.

This law has been in existence four years. It was duly passed by the House of Representatives and the Senate and approved by the President. Is there any reason, and if so would it not now be well to state it, why a provision thought to be necessary in the law of 1874 in respect to the performance of the duties of this office, should not apply in 1878? My knowledge of the workings of the laws of this District is by no means as perfect as I would desire; but the suggestion at once occurred to persons in the city, and was by them communicated to me, that the bond of 1874 was omitted, and apparently without any reason, in 1878. I see no reason why the bond should not be given.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope my friend from Kansas will allow this amendment to go in. It seems, according to the statement of one member of the District Committee, that he supposed this provision was to remain, and that it was merely an error of clerkship that it was not inserted in the report. I am very sure that this will be no burden on the persons who may be nominated for this office. Certainly the men ought to be of sufficient character to be able to obtain a bond of $50,000 without much difficulty; and it will correspond with the law as it has heretofore stood, requiring a bond. I hope, therefore, the Senator from Kansas will not object, but will let this go in.

Mr. INGALLS. This is not a matter of very great consequence one way or the other. I am much more desirous that the bill should proceed than that we should discuss minute details, and I will therefore withdraw my request for a division and ask that the question may be again submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest an amendment in line 22 of section 2. It now reads:

And one of said three commissioners shall be chosen president of the board of commissioners at their first meeting and annually thereafter.

I propose to insert after the word "annually," in line 22, the words "and whenever a vacancy occurs;" so that if, through death or resignation or whatever, there should be no president who is to sign papers for the board, the board may be authorized without any question to fill the vacancy.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me the President ought to designate the presiding officer of a board made up in this way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is another question. Then in line 29, after the word "commissioners," I move to insert the words "appointed from civil life." That relates to the duration of term, three years for those appointed from civil life, to make it conform to what the Senate agreed to yesterday. I believe my friend from Kansas has no objection to that.

Mr. INGALLS. Those words have been inserted already, I think. If not, let them be inserted now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words will be inserted, without objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. At the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa who sits next me, [Mr. KIRKWOOD,] who has been called out a moment, I move to strike out the word "salaried" in line 33. The provision now reads:

Neither of said commissioners, nor any salaried officer whatsoever of the District of Columbia, shall be accepted as surety upon any bond required to be given to the District of Columbia; nor shall any contractor be accepted, &c.

The suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, which with me has great force, was that it would be better and safer not to allow anybody who holds office under the District to be a surety on any of the bonds of the people who are contracting with it, no matter whether the officer had a salary or not that as long as he belonged to the official force of the District, he ought to be excluded from bonds because he might have influence in getting bad bonds and all that sort of thing. At that suggestion I move to strike out the word "salaried."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire to call the attention of the Senator having charge of this bill to line 32. I will read the context to make myself intelligible:

But the first appointment shall be one commissioner for one year and one for two years, and at the expiration of their respective terms their successors shall be appointed for three years.

By the provision of this bill these two officers are to hold their office for three years. There is no provision made in the bill for what length of time the third commissioner shall hold his office. It says one commissioner for one year and one for two years; it says nothing about the third commissioner at all in that connection.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator has probably not observed that the third commissioner is an officer of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, to be detailed from time to time by the President. So it is impossible, while he remains in the Army, to fix specifically the term he shall hold.

Mr. HEREFORD. That was what I desired to call the Senator's attention to. If that is the construction—and it seems to me to be the proper construction—that this third commissioner holds his office at the will of the President, then the President can appoint him and turn him out whenever he may please; and yet the bill goes upon the theory that each of the commissioners is to hold his term for three years. There is certainly a contradiction here.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator will observe the language of lines 28 and 29 and 30 he will see that after the word "commissioners" in line 29 the words "appointed from civil life" have been inserted, which will describe the two commissioners who are to hold for the period of three years.

Mr. HEREFORD. It seems to me that each of the commissioners should hold his term of office for three years, and I see no reason why by law we may not say that an Army officer may hold his office for three years, as well as one from civil life. I think that the term of office ought to be fixed for each one of the commissioners, and that each one should hold his office for three years. For that purpose I move an amendment, to insert in line 32 "and one for three years," so that it will read, "the first appointment shall be one commissioner for one year, one for two years, and one for three years."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope my friend from West Virginia will not insist upon that amendment. That subject was discussed yesterday, and the Senate appear to be of opinion, by the vote it gave, as I was myself certainly, that it was much better to have this Army officer, just as the Army officer who has charge of the public buildings and grounds always has been, subject to detail by the President of the United States according to the exigency of the public service and according to the responsible discretion of the President as to whether in making the first selection he had got the man best adapted for that work; and accordingly the Senate yesterday and this morning also made the phraseology of the bill such as to make clear what the committee intended in that respect. I hope, therefore, this amendment will not be insisted upon.

Mr. HEREFORD. It seems to me that if the argument which the Senator from Vermont urges, to leave this in the discretion of the President, so that if he should not have appointed the proper man the first time he should have an opportunity to correct the error, be good as far as the Army officer is concerned, it is equally good as far as those taken from civil life are concerned, and, if possible, is more potent in their case, for the reason that I believe it is conceded by all persons who have thought on the subject that the Army officers, as a general thing, are without reproach, and that one taken from the Army would be more likely to be accomplished for this position than one taken from civil life, and the President would be less likely to make a mistake in the one case than in the other. I think the amendment ought to prevail.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose a war should break out and, in the judgment of the President, the Commander-in-Chief, the Army officer who had been stationed here in time of peace upon this duty was specially fitted for military duty somewhere else, would it be right to have the President prohibited from calling him into the service, for which he had been enlisted, of the country in time of war, by a legal obligation to keep him here for three years?

Mr. HEREFORD. If that exigency should occur, Congress, I presume, would be in session and could relieve the service. We certainly have enough officers in the Army that taking one from it will not cripple it. There is a superabundance of officers, as has been shown time and again in the debate on this floor and as was pointed out very plainly in some remarks some weeks ago by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] so that there can be no trouble it seems to me there.

Mr. INGALLS. It is too obvious for extended argument that, in order to preserve the discipline of the Army, its officers and soldiers must be under the control of the Commander-in-Chief. It would interfere very seriously with this principle to have Congress designate the period for which an officer should be detailed and assigned to duties in civil life; and for various reasons, therefore, I hope that the amendment will not be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGALLS. After the word "pay," at the end of line 14, in order to define more specifically the compensation that the officer of the Army is to receive who serves on this board of commissioners, I move to insert the words "and allowances;" so as to read:

Nor shall he receive any other compensation than his regular pay and allowances as an officer of the Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this amendment? The Chair hears none. It is agreed to. The question now is on the second section as amended.

The section was agreed to.

The Secretary read the third section.

Mr. INGALLS. There are certain formal and verbal amendments that the committee desire to submit to this section, to which I presume there will be no objection. After "rights," in line 4, I move to insert the word "duties."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the word will be inserted.

Mr. INGALLS. After the word "in," in line 8, I move to insert the words "and imposed upon;" so as to read: "and vested in and imposed upon said commissioners."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to this amendment. The insertion will be made.

Mr. INGALLS. After the word "limitations," in line 12, I move to insert "and provisions," and in the same line to strike out the word "provided" and insert the word "contained;" so as to read: "subject to the limitations and provisions herein contained."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection; and this amendment will be made.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the word "power," in line 20, I move to insert "duties" and to change "power" to "powers;" so as to read: "and exercise the duties, powers, and authority aforesaid;" and after "such," in line 21, to insert "duties" before "power," and make "power" "powers."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These changes will be made, no objection being interposed.

Mr. INGALLS. In line 39, after the word "rights," I move to insert "penalty or forfeiture," and to change "rights" to "right."

Mr. EDMUNDS. You do not want any "or" between "penalty" and "forfeiture."

Mr. INGALLS. Yes; leave out that "or."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be made, no objection being interposed.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the word "any," at the commencement of line 40, I move to insert the words "said district or commissioners or;" so as to read: "or cause action existing in favor of said District, or commissioners, or any citizen of the District of Columbia," &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. After the word "commenced," in line 41, I move to insert the words "proceeded for."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. In line 79, I move to strike out the word "thereof" and insert the words "of such approved estimates;" so that the line will read: "and the remaining 50 per cent. of such approved estimates shall be levied," &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is agreed to, no objection being made.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Section 3 authorizes the commissioners, in anticipation of revenue, to borrow not exceeding $200,000 in any one year. The idea of the committee, I suppose, was that the commissioners should repay that money out of the revenues of the current year. I think, out of abundant caution, after the words "per annum," in line 31, we should insert the words "which shall be repaid out of the revenues of the current year."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to my friend from Delaware the propriety of striking out the whole of that clause. We now have a provision of law, which has been found I think to be very useful if this District is not going to be swamped entirely, prohibiting the increase of the debt at all and under any circumstances. Now we propose by this permanent form of government to set the District on its feet, and for Congress to contribute a portion, and so on. The effect of this provision as it now stands in the bill is to increase the amount of the debt of the District by $200,000, a standing increase because we know by human experience money will always be borrowed when there is authority to borrow it. We are always, therefore, just $200,000 behind. If they could only increase for one year and get up even, or begin even with this bill, then the prohibition against borrowing ought to be absolute and complete.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I concur in the view of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So that, if the Senator will withdraw his amendment, I will move to strike out the whole provision.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I withdraw my amendment to allow the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to take its place.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to strike out in lines 28, 29, 30, and 31, these words:

But they may borrow, in anticipation of collection of revenue, not to exceed in any one year $200,000, at a rate of interest not exceeding 6 per cent. per annum.

I think it will be a great advantage to the credit and the prosperity and the success of this District if everybody understands that its expenses are to be paid out of money that has been collected from taxes or voted by Congress for its share, and that no authority to borrow shall exist. This is, as I have stated, an authority to increase the standing indebtedness of the District by nearly a quarter of a million of dollars. I hope my friend in charge of the bill will assent to having this thing start even and being kept even.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, if it were even, I should be very glad to consent to start even and have it kept so hereafter; but unfortunately the District is behind at the present time; it has been behind for a long period of time in consequence of the disinclination or unwillingness of persons who have been assessed to pay their taxes, and they cannot be collected, and several departments of the government will be very seriously crippled and embarrassed, if not entirely destroyed, unless some provision is made by which the revenue can be anticipated. I should be glad, and I think it would be proper, for Congress to make an appropriation to put the government on its feet and help clear the District from debt, and let them begin anew, and then provide that hereafter no indebtedness shall be incurred. But here are the existing facts. We had a few weeks ago to pass a bill to prevent the public schools here from being closed. There are other departments of the government that require assistance. Unless Congress acts speedily and promptly, there will be another default on the semi-annual interest on some of their funded debt. This provision is to enable the commissioners to bridge over difficulties that exist in consequence of the non-payment of taxes and the present condition of the revenues of the District. I do not see how it will be possible for the affairs of the District to be carried on unless Congress either makes a direct appropriation to assist the government out of its present difficulties or authorizes the commissioners to borrow money.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, there is force in what the Senator from Kansas says; but it is only the force of saying that the permanent debt of this District shall be increased by $200,000, because the moment you get to this limit there can be no more borrowing, and then when an emergency and difficulty occurs they are then as badly off as they are now. It does seem to me—and I have found that from observation and experience in the municipality in which I live when I am at home—that if you grant this power it will be a usual resort. I think that to put our foot down and declare that there is no money to be borrowed, but that the money expended shall be collected from the tax-payers and from Congress, (Congress agrees to be a tax-payer to the extent of one-half,) is the only safe and sure way of getting on. The District is now of course drowned in debt. The taxes necessary to pay the interest on the debt of this District alone are heavy, saying nothing about the current expenses. This is a proposition to allow a permanent increase at 6 per cent. of about a quarter of a million dollars.

Then I wish to call attention to another point, and which of course will be corrected if the Senate wish to keep the clause in. As this clause reads this is an authority to borrow to the extent of $200,000 in any one year, and that may run on forever, and you can increase the debt of the District $200,000 a year steadily. Of course that was not the intention, and that can be corrected by a change; but I feel very strongly the propriety of striking the whole thing out and conducting the business of this District in cash.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think the Senator from Vermont misapprehends the purposes of this provision entirely. It is not contemplated by us that the debt of the District shall be permanently increased at all. The object is to serve a temporary convenience of city authorities and the people who may owe them taxes. It is to meet a case like this: just after the financial year begins it turns out that the collector of revenue has been slow, the people are oppressed, the times are hard with the people, he finds it difficult to collect taxes as fast as the wants of the government require. In a case of that kind the object of the provision is to let the commissioners anticipate the collection of the revenue two, three, four, or five months, as the occasion may require, and it is certainly manifest that the purpose is to require as soon as the taxes can be collected that the debt thus borrowed shall be paid, and paid within the year for which it was borrowed. The simple purpose is to do exactly what the Senate did a few days ago in reference to the schools. The money set apart for the schools had been expended, and there was no money in the treasury that could be applied to that purpose. Application was made to Congress to allow the commissioners to anticipate the collection of the taxes by $75,000 until they could be collected and applied, and as soon as that sum shall be collected and they can apply it it is to be applied. The object of this provision is to avoid the trouble of coming to Congress every time it is necessary to anticipate the revenue for a small sum of money.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it should not be necessary to anticipate.

Mr. MERRIMON. But the circumstances are such not only in the District, but everywhere else, as that it is very difficult at all times to have the treasury full. It is very difficult for the people here, hundreds, thousands, and tens of thousands of whom are persons who can barely get along, to pay their taxes exactly at the moment the law requires it to be done. We must temper justice with mercy; we must give the people a reasonable opportunity to pay their taxes, not in a day, or a week, or a month, but in the course of the year, as the convenience of the city requires. It seems to me that is all that is necessary or that ought to be required.

There is no purpose here to authorize the commissioners to create a debt of $200,000 annually and thereby permanently increase the debt. The simple object is, and it seems to me the words plainly indicate it, to allow the commissioners to anticipate for a brief period the collection of the taxes; and that is very important indeed.

Congress is obliged—in the very nature of government it is so—to repose some confidence in these high officers. What vast powers are lodged in the President and governors of States! If the people cannot trust their rulers at all, they had better have none. These commissioners are to be high officers; they will be the governors of this great city under the direction and supervision of Congress; and if we cannot trust them with some power when they are under the eye of the people and Congress and the President all the time, we had better not make them at all. When they get this money, there is no possibility of their using it or applying it to their own use. They can have no motive other than devoting it to the uses and conveniences of the District.

Mr. EATON. I hope this amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] will not be adopted. I like the amendment offered by my friend from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] and then the reasoning of the Senator from Vermont falls to the ground; it does not become a permanent debt, it is merely a temporary debt.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Constantly existing year after year.

Mr. EATON. No, not increasing at all, but is to be paid out of the first collection of the assessed taxes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then they may borrow the next $200,000 immediately.

Mr. EATON. If that obtains, I shall at the proper time move that the word "six" be stricken out and "five" inserted, so that it shall be at 5 per cent. interest, instead of 6 per cent. I have no doubt of the ability of the city to borrow money at 5 per cent.

Mr. DORSEY. I agree with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] that the time ought to come when the District shall get out of debt and quit borrowing. Ever since I have had anything to do with the District of Columbia it has been necessary for the authorities every year to anticipate their taxes and borrow money from the Government of the United States to support their schools, or run their local government. But I suggest that instead of adopting the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont we leave the bill as it now stands, and provide that the District may borrow $200,000 the first year after this bill goes into effect, and let it stop there.

Mr. SAULSBURY. When I offered the amendment requiring that the money borrowed should be repaid out of the revenues of the current year, I thought that was the purpose of the bill.

Mr. ROLLINS. That is the very thing I was trying to get the floor to suggest.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Vermont, however, thought we had better not confer any power on the commissioners to increase the debt of the District. In that view I concur most heartily. Congress has had to assume for the people of this country some twenty-odd million dollars of debt created by the managers of the affairs of the District of Columbia. I think there ought to be some limitation upon the power of the commissioners or those having charge of the affairs of the District of Columbia to create a public debt to be saddled ultimately upon the people of the country. I am aware that there might be some inconveniences arising from the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. The commissioners might feel themselves somewhat embarrassed for funds at the commencement of any fiscal year; but that could be remedied very easily. If there should be a provision added to this bill such as obtains in many of the States of the Union and in many of the cities of the country that taxables who would come forward and pay within a limited time should have an abatement equal to the amount of the fees paid to the collectors, you would find the treasury replenished by the voluntary payment of the tax-payers of the District. In the town in which I live when the school assessment is made any taxable within ten days after notice is given may come forward and pay with a deduction of 10 per cent. of the amount assessed upon him, and we at once pay our taxes. More than one-half the taxes are paid within the ten days under a provision of that kind. Put a provision in this bill that taxables of the District of Columbia may come forward and receive a rebate, and instead of being deficient in revenue you would have an abundant treasury from the very start.

I suggest to the Senator from Kansas having charge of this bill that he incorporate a provision of that kind in it, and there will be no deficit in the revenue and no necessity for borrowing $200,000.

I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. If that fails, I shall then insist on the amendment I originally offered to this provision.

Mr. ROLLINS. I suggest that the question be first taken upon the motion to amend the paragraph which the Senator from Vermont moves to strike out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware has withdrawn his amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will offer that amendment, if it is desirable, and take it first.

Mr. ROLLINS. Let it be reported.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The words are: "which shall be repaid out of the revenues of the current year;" to come in after "per annum," in line 31.

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire to limit this authority to this year, to have it apply only to this case, so that they may bridge over the present difficulty and pay the amount which is temporarily borrowed out of the current income of the year and not have it apply hereafter. If the Senator from Delaware will withdraw——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will submit to any modification which will meet the Senator's views.

Mr. ROLLINS. I propose to amend the paragraph.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear the amendment reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "borrow," in line 29, it is proposed to insert "for the first fiscal year after this act takes effect;" and after the words "per annum," in line 31, to insert "which shall be repaid out of the revenues of that year."

Mr. EDMUNDS. In that case the words "in any one year" should be stricken out.

Mr. ROLLINS. Yes, I include that in the motion.

Mr. MERRIMON. Now, Mr. President, I really think this is a very unwise movement. I am satisfied it will be very difficult in each succeeding year to collect taxes sufficient to supply the immediate wants of the treasury of the District immediately after the new financial year begins. It will be difficult not only this year, but it will be difficult every year; and just such a convenience as this will be necessary, so that if the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire shall be adopted some means ought to be provided by which the treasury can be promptly replenished in any year; and if it shall be adopted I trust the Senator from Delaware will embody his suggestion in a proper formula, so that a premium may be paid for prompt payment of taxes, for something will be obliged to be done in order to replenish the treasury promptly. If it is not done we shall find the necessity every year of passing a special act authorizing the commissioners of the District to anticipate the collection of taxes.

Mr. ROLLINS. I hope there will be such wise management of the finances of this District as will not render it necessary to have annual acts of Congress in this respect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, to strike out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw that amendment now, the amendment just agreed to having been adopted.

Mr. EATON. I move to strike out the word "six," in line 31, and insert "five;" so as to read:

> At a rate of interest not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. In this section, from lines 91 to 99 there is a provision as to the rate of taxation upon real and personal property in the District. The bill provides a taxation not to "exceed $2 on every $100 of real and personal estate not exempt by law, according to the cash valuation thereof," and on property without the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, at the rate of $1.50 on every $100, meaning I suppose upon real and personal property. My judgment of that rate of taxation is that it is too high, especially upon personal estate. All taxes upon personalty have the objection of being inquisitorial and almost always illusory. The power of concealing this property from taxation is very well known, and the effect of it is very well realized by all who have practical experience on this subject. It would have more effect in driving population out of the District than almost any law that could be devised to discourage immigration here, to tax personalty at the rate proposed.

I have no doubt the committee have considered this. It is not a matter that needs further discussion; because I apprehend every member of the Senate has formed some judgment of his own as to this rate. I shall signify what my judgment is by moving to amend the amendment of the committee so that the rate upon real estate in the cities shall be $1.50 upon every $100 of cash valuation, and upon personal estate $1, and upon all property real and personal outside of the two cities $1. The Clerk can take the amendment as I dictate it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will take down the amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. In line 92 I move to strike out the words "two dollars" and insert "one dollar and fifty cents;" in line 93 to strike out the words "and personal;" and to insert in line 94 "and on the personal property of residents $1 on every $100." I may note also as an amendment that can be considered in solido, in line 98 to strike out the words "and fifty cents," so that the last clause of the second proviso will read:

> The rate for any one year shall not exceed $1 on every $100.

That is as to rural property.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed in line 92 to strike out "two dollars" and insert "one dollar and fifty cents;" in line 93, after "real," to strike out the words "and personal;" and in line 94, after "law," to insert the words "and on the personal property of residents one dollar on every one hundred dollars," and in line 98 to strike out the words, "and fifty cents;" so as to read, if amended:

Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed one dollar and fifty cents on every one hundred dollars of real estate not exempt by law, and on the personal property of residents one dollar on every one hundred dollars, according to the cash valuation thereof: And provided further, Upon property without the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and to be so designated by the assessors in their annual returns, the rate for any one year shall not exceed one dollar on every one hundred dollars.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senate will observe that the limitations that are prescribed in section 3, to which the Senator from Delaware has referred, are the maxima of taxation and not the rate that must be levied. If the bill is examined in detail, it will be found that all the estimates of expenditure and of taxation must be submitted by the commissioners to the Secretary of the Treasury for his approval or disapproval annually, and that no levy can be made until it is so approved. Inasmuch as this safeguard was thrown about the taxing power, the committee thought it wise to make the maximum so large as to cover all reasonable anticipations in regard to the revenue of the District.

According to the report of the assessors of the District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, the total value of real estate in the District of Columbia amounts to $97,672,228, and of personal property, $9,052,335, being an aggregate of personal and real property of something about $107,000,000. The total expenditures for the past year have been somewhere in the neighborhood of two million and a half, I think between $2,500,000 and $2,600,000. It is obvious, therefore, that it is necessary to establish a rate of taxation that will enable the District to raise the amount of money required to carry on the government with the per cent. that is provided to be paid by Congress. Under ordinary circumstances the amount of $2 upon a hundred would be greater than would be required; but there is no danger that any more will be levied than is required, because the bill provides that Congress shall appropriate 50 per cent. of the amount that is to be raised, and that before so doing they shall approve the estimates submitted to them by the Secretary of the Treasury. Therefore it seems to me that the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware is hardly necessary and that he ought not to insist upon it, because the safeguards previously thrown around the taxing power are so certain that there is no possibility of any injudicious or extravagant exercise of it, and as exigencies may arise in which it may be necessary to exceed the sum that is named by him, he should leave the maximum as named in the bill.

In regard to another point suggested by the Senator from Delaware, I desire to say also that the limitation that he proposes upon all personal property in the District, that in order to be taxable it must be owned by residents, is very unjust. I presume he cannot mean that if personal property is brought in here by residents of other States for sale or for purposes of commerce or manufacture, that owner and that property should escape taxation. If property is brought here for the purpose of profit, or if it is brought here and kept and receives the protection of the law, it ought to bear its proportionate share of the expense of administering the law. It seems to me that the distinction which the Senator proposes to make is one that is very unjust and ought not to prevail.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the Senator yield to me just to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. INGALLS. I am done.

Mr. ROLLINS. I am afraid a suggestion which the Senator has made would lead members of the Senate into error, and to that I wish to call the Senator's attention. An act which was passed some time since provides for a reassessment or rather a new valuation of all the property of the District. Under that valuation, I am informed that the value of the property subject to taxation in the city would be reduced some $20,000,000.

Mr. INGALLS. The figures that I quoted were from the rolls now existing for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878.

Mr. ROLLINS. Certainly, but if the valuation is reduced $20,000,000 the rate of taxation must be increased in order to realize the amount of money required. For this reason the limit was placed at $2 on the hundred rather than at $1.50.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, notwithstanding the statement submitted by the Senator from Kansas and what has been supplemented by the Senator from New Hampshire, I am still in favor of so much of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Delaware as proposes to limit the amount of taxation to $1.50 on the hundred. I take that view because I think the statements of the two Senators will justify me in coming to that conclusion. Let us take the statement made by the Senator from Kansas. He says the valuation of the property of this city is nearly $107,000,000. One and a half per cent. upon that is $1,600,000. The Government is to pay a like sum. Double it and it is $3,200,000; and the Senator tells us that the expenditures of this city last year were about $2,000,000.

Mr. INGALLS. And a half.

Mr. HAMLIN. Two million and a half. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. INGALLS. I said between twenty-five and twenty-six hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator from Maine does not allow for the reduction of the property to be reassessed, which will be $20,000,000.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand. Suppose the valuation is $100,000,000 and we assess a tax of 1½ per cent., the product is $1,500,000. Then if the Government contribute a like sum the total is $3,000,000, making $500,000 in excess of what the Senator from Kansas says was the expenditure for the past year. One dollar and a half on the hundred dollars, therefore, is ample, in my judgment, taking the Senator's own statement.

But let us come now to the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire. I do not know how much there may be in it. It is not authentic. We have no returns. It is suggestive; it is an estimate rather than a return. Suppose the property be $80,000,000; then you have an assessment of $1.50 to the hundred dollars, which would yield $1,200,000. Let the Government contribute a like sum and you have $2,400,000, about what the Senator from Kansas said was the expenditure, and this even taking the reduced valuation. It is safe to keep within proper limits. When it is shown by the authoritative statement of the Senator from Kansas (the other I do not regard as authoritative) that $1.50 on the hundred dollars will give a surplus of half a million dollars, I think the Senator ought not to ask us to exceed that sum.

But I want to say one thing more. I cannot agree with the Senator from Delaware in relation to reducing the percentage of tax upon personal property to $1 per hundred. If he would put it at $2 on personalty and leave it at $1.50 on real estate, in my judgment he would come much nearer a right and equitable rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He did not move to make the rate different between real and personal estate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understood the Senator's amendment to reduce the rate of taxation on personal property within the city limits $1 on the hundred. Am I right?

Mr. BAYARD. On personal property, yes; the personal property of residents.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; the personal property of residents. I say the right rule would be to reverse it and let the personal estate pay the increased and not the diminished rate of taxation. Why? First, because you will not in any case very likely get at the whole amount of personal property. Governments are instituted to protect us in our real and personal property, and precisely alike. I think we can draw no distinction between what the Government affords to the man who owns the realty and the man who owns the personal property. You will not get at the whole amount of personal property; but when you get at the amount, whatever it may be, it should pay a sum equal to that imposed upon the realty, by all means. If there is any difference I say it should be in favor of the realty, because there are other special taxations imposed upon it that do not apply to personal property. If a street be paved in front of the owner of a house, in addition to paying the general tax of 1½ per cent., or whatever it may be, he has got to pay the specific special tax for paving the street in front of his residence. You make it greater upon the realty in most cases if you leave them alike in the general rate of taxation, while if you diminish the tax upon the personal property, as to the man who may be the owner of nothing but personal property and who asks and who receives the protection of the law in his rights of personal property just as much as the man who owns the real estate, you leave him at a less rate than you impose upon the man who owns real estate. I will vote with the Senator (and I will therefore ask for a division of the question) to reduce the rate to $1.50 on real estate. I cannot vote with him to reduce the rate on personal property.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, this question of taxation is a very practical one. The rate of taxation may be fixed at 1½ or 2 per cent., and the amount to be procured by it will wholly depend upon the rate of the assessment. Assess your property at $1,000 and lay a tax of 2 per cent. upon it and you get no more tax than if you assessed your property at $2,000 and laid 1 per cent. upon it. I believe it is admitted generally that the present assessment of property in this District is excessive, unfair, and exceedingly erroneous, and that a reassessment of the real estate of this District is imperatively demanded for the purposes of justice. Of course if the rates of this assessment are to be lowered and you desire to procure the same amount of money by taxation, you must increase the rate. So, then, until the honorable Senator from Maine or I can know what amount of revenue is to be raised we shall have to know first the value of the assessment, and then, of course, the rate to be imposed upon it. The knowledge of one without the knowledge of the other would be entirely illusive. So far, then, we may be groping in the dark to fix a rate of assessment unless we know the value of the property and the assessment which has been put upon it.

When I spoke of the tax upon personal estate of $2 on the hundred being excessive, I was giving a judgment formed elsewhere than in this debate, to which I am compelled still to adhere. The tax upon personal property is an illusory tax the world over. The means of concealing personal property do not apply to real estate. All men I think who consider the subject of taxation by true lights will learn that taxation upon visible property is the true basis of laying taxes at all. Where the property can be seen, where it is capable of ocular demonstration, you may lay your tax and collect it with some certainty. Where it is dependent upon the honesty of the owner as to whether he will disclose its existence, or if its existence its value, you are then dealing with a very illusory question. I believe that where you are to trust the conscience in a great measure of the party whom you are to tax, you had better put your taxation at a more reasonable rate, to which he would be more apt to accommodate himself, and especially to tax only those who are actual residents of the District, who having their homes, their domiciles, in this place, owe that obedience and support which is the correlative to protection by government.

This is a question of judgment. If Senators shall think that under a new assessment of this property the rate of $2 per $100 of the cash value of real estate is not excessive, they will vote for it; but if, thinking as I do, that $1.50 per hundred upon property reasonably assessed is a fair rate of taxation, they will accept my amendment. I suppose the question will first be taken upon the amendment as to the real estate, and subsequently upon the personalty. I have given my views upon the subject and propose to vote in accordance with them. It remains to be seen whether the Senate coincides with me or not.

Another thing I would say. The honorable Senator from Kansas very properly remarked that the bill contains excellent provisions of protection as to the estimates for the expenditures of the District during the future year, that they must be first estimated by the commissioners, next approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and then submitted to Congress, so that Congress shall have the control of the cost of governing the District, of carrying on the public works here, and then the laying of the tax shall follow that. I have before now expressed the belief, and I have only to reiterate it, that I do not believe the property of this District in the hands of private citizens can bear one-half of the cost of keeping up improvements such as we see around us now on the scale which they have assumed. The effect of overtaxation is of course very obvious. It stops all improvements; it deters immigration; it lowers the value of property, discourages persons from coming here and attempting to improve the city. The reason for it is simply this: that the people who own the property here have little or nothing to say in regard to the scale of expenditure which shall be made in regard to them.

I have given a general idea of the causes which led me to offer this amendment. I ask, as I suppose it will be voted upon separately, that the first question may be taken upon the taxing real estate, which I propose to reduce from $2 as a maximum to $1.50 per $100.

Mr. HARRIS. If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware shall prevail, it is not improbable that we shall year by year have the commissioners of the District of Columbia appealing to Congress, if indeed they would not have a right to demand at the hands of Congress, to make up a deficit of that part of the revenues of the District of Columbia that it is proposed shall be raised by taxation. Before the necessity for levying a tax at all can arise under the provisions of this bill, these commissioners must make their estimates, item by item, itemizing every expenditure that is authorized to be made. The Secretary of the Treasury investigates, and approves or disapproves the estimates so made. They are transmitted to Congress. Congress investigates and determines that the objects of expenditure are proper, and orders the expenditures to be made, and appropriates 50 per cent. of the amount, requiring the other half to be raised by taxation.

If you limit the taxing power in the hands of these commissioners according to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, it is not improbable that when they have gone to the maximum they will fail to raise revenue enough to pay one-half of the current expenses of the District of Columbia; and in the event that they do fail to raise revenue enough to pay the one-half, the expenditure has been authorized and required by Congress, the work has been done, and the commissioners would have no alternative but to come to Congress and say, "You have tied our hands; we had no power to levy a tax higher than the one we have levied, and having levied it, we have failed to collect the amount of money necessary to pay the one-half of the current expenses." It will result, I apprehend, year by year and every year, in an appeal to Congress to make up the deficit of that part of the revenues that should have been raised from taxation; to avoid which I desire to give to the commissioners the power to tax to such an extent as will enable them to raise whatever proportion of the revenues Congress may determine it is proper should be raised by taxation. Guarded and limited as the incurring of liabilities is under this bill, there can be no danger in giving to the commissioners the discretion that this bill gives them, without the amendment of the Senator from Delaware. Indeed, I suppose the rate fixed by the amendment of the Senator from Delaware is lower than the rate of taxation fixed in every State in the Union. I certainly know of no State in the Union where the rate of taxation is so low as that indicated by the Senator's amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. On personal property?

Mr. HARRIS. I was not speaking as to personal property particularly: I was speaking generally. But the rate of taxation, upon personal property and real property both, in my State is very much higher than the rate indicated by the amendment of the Senator from Delaware. I have not investigated as to the rate of taxation in the various States, but I repeat that I doubt if there is a State where the rate of taxation is as low as the rate fixed by the amendment. For one, I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I have not seen anybody who believes that when the property of this District is reassessed it will be assessed at its present value by twenty or more million dollars. I do not think there can be any reasonable doubt about that. But suppose we put the assessed value at $100,000,000; then, if you adopt the limitation suggested by the Senator from Delaware and impose a tax of 1½ per cent. upon that $100,000,000, we should raise a million and a half of dollars, which doubled would be just the sum required for the next current year. The amount of money that will be required to administer the government of this District next year is estimated at $3,000,000. If the Government shall pay half that sum, then the people of the District will have to pay the other half. Whether the limitation the Senator suggests will enable the city authorities to raise the million and a half from the people depends upon the assessed value of the property of the residents. It is perfectly plain to those informed on the subject that the assessed value will not be $100,000,000. The present assessed value is in round numbers $100,000,000, and everybody concedes that the assessed value is greatly too large. I do not believe, from the lights before me, that it will reach $80,000,000. If it should be $80,000,000, then 1½ per cent. would not raise the sum that the people must pay if the Government pays one-half the expenses. I repeat that $3,000,000 must be raised next year to administer the government of this District. The people are willing to pay half that sum. When their property is reassessed it will not reach a greater sum than $80,000,000, if it reaches that. One and a half per cent. upon $80,000,000 will not raise the sum that they must pay if they pay half of the $3,000,000. I beg to add, as I believe it has been suggested, that there is no danger that the commissioners will exercise the authority too freely that is conferred upon them. They will have every motive not to do it, and there are ample restrictions to restrain them if they were disposed to do it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I only wish to say one word upon this point. The very fact that the new assessment is to produce a reduction of valuations must exist on account of the fact that the property in this District is not increasing in value, and is not producing income. The large amount of the property in this District, although it has value, is property that does not produce money, but it is property that shelters the small householder. The only good of it is the fact that it does shelter him; but it does not bring him any money to pay debts. The amount of business in this District that produces money is of course very small. So there being, as we are told, and I suppose correctly, a necessity for diminishing the present valuations, it goes strongly to show that the rate of taxation ought to be made less than it is now, less than $1.50 per hundred, because the reason of the diminution is the fact that the property is not producing as much income as it did, and that makes the property of less value. That being the state of the case, the logic of the thing would be that the District must still further economize; it must reduce its expenses still further. If the people cannot feed their children and support their families, &c., in the present state of the business of the District, then we must diminish by not sweeping the streets so often, if you please, and submit to all the inconveniences to which poor people are obliged to submit. That is the necessary and proper result of it. Consequently it appears to me that there is no ground whatever for increasing this maximum of $1.50 we have had for four years.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will the Senator allow me to interject a remark into his speech, which he may reply to at his pleasure? The shrinkage of values in the District is not strange. There have been shrinkages of value in real estate and in all other sorts of property all over the Union everywhere. When the present assessments were made there was a higher rate of value.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is perfectly true, Mr. President, and that proves still more strongly, as it appears to me, exactly the proposition that I was advancing, that wherever there is a diminution of values there ought to be a diminution of burdens, even in proportion to the diminution of values a still greater diminution of burdens, because it shows that there is not a state of prosperity and that money is harder to be got than it was before. It may be a great deal harder for a resident, a citizen, of this town to pay a dollar and a half this year on a reduced valuation of 20 per cent. than it was four years ago in the state of prosperity to pay a dollar and a half on the higher valuation.

Mr. MERRIMON. But the difficulty about it is that here are certain items of taxation which are obliged to be paid, whether the times are hard or flush.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I understand; but I understand also that a community being an aggregation of individuals is just like each single individual, that when his means and estate are diminishing, however hard it is, he must diminish his expenses; otherwise he goes to ruin. As I have said, to illustrate, we sweep the streets here two or three days every week. Let us stand the dust and only sweep them once a week, and save a hundred or two thousand dollars a year that way. I may not strike the right item; I only speak of that to illustrate what I am saying. So in respect of almost all the expenses of the District. There are some of them of course, as in the case of a great epidemic where health requires that whatever money is necessary and whatever the expense, it should be devoted to the protection of the health and lives of the people. I speak of that as an illustration. That is true enough; but after all, when you take the general average, if there is any blessing in government at all, when you find the valuation of property and the prosperity of the community running down, that community, instead of increasing the rate of its taxation, which is merely a type of the rate of its expenditures, must reduce it, because taxation is only a step to expense. The increase of poverty ought to be followed by an increase of economy which shall counteract that poverty and enable the tide to turn the other way, as it seems to me.

Then, Mr. President, as I was going on to say, four years ago when this present system was adopted everything was in a very unpleasant condition and this subject of the rate of taxation was thoroughly discussed. In that bill it was carefully considered by one of the best selected committees that we have ever had in the Senate, and that is saying a good deal. The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] I remember was one member of it and the honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] was another, and the others were like them. They, after the most careful consideration, reported a maximum of $1.50, which has stood ever since and has been re-enacted annually ever since as being the utmost that the people could bear. Now it is proposed in this period of increased diminution of value to make it elastic up to $2, and on the ground that there is no danger because there are to be estimates. The very fact that we provide for a revenue based on a two-dollar assessment will be a temptation to those who submit estimates and to those who approve them to let their estimates run up to the maximum. If you keep the maximum down to the dollar and a half that it has been for the four years and has worked so well, the estimates will be made in conformity to it, and the prosperity of the people, I should hope, would develop. That is the way it seems to me. Consequently I shall vote for the first part of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware. About the other part I agree with the Senator from Maine.

Mr. INGALLS. For the eleven months ending the 1st of last November the total amount of receipts of this District from taxes and revenue was $1,712,125.77.

Mr. EDMUNDS. For eleven months; but there was one installment due two months afterward, you see.

Mr. INGALLS. Add to this the amount of congressional appropriations, which was about $800,000 in round numbers, and there was a grand total of receipts, as reported by the treasurer, of $2,539,138.75. It is just, however, that I should say that this estimate embraces certain extraordinary expenditures that have been made, including the paving of Pennsylvania avenue. During the same period the total expenditures for all purposes were $2,516,641.71, which left on the 1st day of last November a balance subject to check of between eighty-seven and eighty-eight thousand dollars.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why was that made up for eleven months, instead of twelve?

Mr. INGALLS. On account of the system of book-keeping adopted by the Treasury.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would only cover apparently the receipts of one-half of the taxes, because the taxes are paid by half-yearly installments. You could not get the two semi-annual payments into that statement.

Mr. INGALLS. It includes the greater portion of the taxes. This revenue was derived, as I have before stated, from the assessment upon a total valuation of real and personal property of between one hundred and six and one hundred and seven million dollars in the entire District. Everybody admits that the present valuation of property is altogether too high.

I believe it is at least 33⅓ per cent. above what it should be upon a fair comparison with the assessed valuation of property in similar localities elsewhere. The Senate will observe, therefore, that the present rate of taxation on realty being $1.50 on the hundred, as now provided by law, there is barely sufficient income derived to allow the expenditures of the District to be liquidated. Under a law that has been recently enacted, a reassessment and revaluation of the real property of the District is to be made. It would not be at all surprising if the realty valuation should be reduced so that it would not aggregate above sixty-five or seventy million dollars. If that is the case, it is very apparent that even under the 50 per cent. clause which this measure provides for it will not be possible to raise the proportion that the District will be called upon to pay. At least the margin will be so very slight that in case of the default in payment which always occurs in every community, the revenues will be so largely diminished that the inevitable consequences will again follow, and the community will be compelled to call again upon Congress for relief.

Under the diminished valuation, therefore, that is sure to occur, the maximum percentage established by this measure cannot be any more burdensome or oppressive than that provided by the law as it now exists. In view of that fact, taken in connection with the fact that all these estimates are to be supervised by Congress, what reasonable objection exists to allowing it to stand as now provided in the bill of the committee? It seems to me to be necessary and essential that this maximum should be preserved. Otherwise there may be and probably will be immediately deficiencies occurring that will require appropriations by Congress and immediate amendments of the law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the first amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 92 it is proposed to strike out "$2" and insert "$1.50."

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 19 and the noes 17, no quorum voting.

Mr. INGALLS and Mr. SARGENT called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 22; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the next amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to the amendment of the committee.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 93 it is proposed to strike out the words "and personal," and in line 94, after the word "law," to insert "and on the personal property of residents $1 on every $100."

Mr. BAYARD. The proposition is now to reduce the rate of tax upon the personal property of residents. It is now $1.50 and I propose to reduce it to $1 per hundred.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire if both real and personal estate will not now stand at $1.50 as the bill has been amended. I should like to have the Secretary report that part of the section that has been amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the section where it has just been amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. As far as amended the proviso reads:

Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $1.50 on every $100 of real estate not exempt by law.

Mr. SARGENT. What does it say about personal estate?

The CHIEF CLERK. And then it is proposed to amend by inserting after the word "law," in line 94, "and on the personal property of residents $1 on every $100."

Mr. ALLISON. Suppose the amendment of the Senator from Delaware does not prevail, would not personal property be taxed $1.50 under the bill as it stands?

Mr. INGALLS. I wish the Secretary would read the proviso as it now stands.

Mr. HOAR. If the amendment does not prevail, personal property stands under the old law unaffected, as I understand it.

Mr. SARGENT. As I understand the reading, the Senate struck out "and personal," and those words are not now in the substitute, so that there is no tax on personal estate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the second amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HAMLIN. As I understand it, if we adopt this amendment it will make the tax upon personal property $1 on the hundred. If we do not adopt the amendment it will leave it to be $1.50 on the hundred, which is just the same as the real-estate tax.

Mr. HOAR. No; that is not it.

Mr. SARGENT. It is strange we cannot have the proviso reported as it would read without the amendment. I ask the Secretary to read the proviso as it would stand without the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proviso will be reported without the pending amendment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $1.50 on every $100 of real estate not exempt by law, according to the cash valuation thereof.

Mr. SARGENT. Is there anything about personal property there?

The CHIEF CLERK. That was stricken out.

Mr. HOAR. I move to strike out the word "real." I suppose that amendment which applies to the previous part of the paragraph would come in order before the one pending.

Mr. MERRIMON. I suggest to the Clerk that he is mistaken. The words "and personal" were not stricken out. That proposition has not yet been voted on.

Mr. ALLISON. Let us move to reconsider and we can get it right.

Mr. SARGENT. Let us understand it. It is very important to know whether those words remain in the proviso or not.

Mr. MERRIMON. The proposition which carried was to reduce the maximum from $2 to $1.50.

Mr. SARGENT. On real estate.

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes; on real estate.

Mr. SARGENT. Can the Chair inform us now how that part of the section stands?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the section as it stood before it was amended by the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, and then he will read the amendment of the Senator from Delaware. He will first read that part of the section as it stood unamended.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proviso before it was amended read as follows:

Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $2 on every $100 of real and personal estate not exempt by law, according to the cash valuation thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proviso will now be reported as amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. As amended, that portion of the section reads:

Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $1.50 on every $100 of real estate not exempt by law——

Mr. HOAR. I understood the Chair——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Read right along.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will continue to read the proviso.

The CHIEF CLERK. The pending amendment is to insert after the word "law" the words "and on the personal property of residents $1 on every $100."

Mr. HOAR. I understood that the Chair directed the Secretary to read the amendment which was offered and passed, so that we can see whether the Secretary is right in his judgment of its effect on the proposed statute. I desire that the amendment as it was stated by the Chair and voted upon be again stated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We only voted on one-half of it.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I want to see.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now read the proviso unamended, and then read that part of the section as amended by the one amendment adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Clear through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Clear through, as though that were the only amendment and there were none other pending.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is it. That will show how it stands.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $2 on every $100 of real and personal estate not exempt by law, according to the cash valuation thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now read the proviso as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $1.50 on every $100 of real estate not exempt by law ——

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, no.

Mr. SARGENT. What are the words stricken out?

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his point of order.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand the proviso as amended to be as the Secretary has read it; and in order that the Senate may see whether that is so, I ask the Chair to direct the amendment as just proposed and stated by the Chair to be read, to know whether it brings the Senate to that result. What was the amendment just passed upon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the proviso be read as amended.

Mr. HOAR. I make no such request whatever.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. The request is that the amendment just passed upon be stated again by the Chair as he stated it before the vote was taken, so as to know whether it results in leaving the section as read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator desires the section to be read as it would stand unamended, and then to be read as amended.

Mr. HOAR. No; the Chair will see the difference. The question is whether inserting the amendment adopted has the effect of leaving in only what the Secretary last read. That depends upon what was the amendment which was put and adopted; whether the motion was to also strike out the words "and personal." That is what I desire to know.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now state the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, which will bring to light what the Senator from Massachusetts desires. The Senator from Delaware moved to strike out and insert. Will the Senator from Delaware state his amendment as he offered it?

Mr. BAYARD. I endeavored to make my amendment clear, and so placed it in the bill as to render it intelligible, excluding any other meaning than that which I intended. I moved to strike out on line 92 the words "two dollars" and insert "one dollar and fifty cents," and on line 93 to strike out the words "and personal," so that as amended it would read:

Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $1.50 on every $100 of real estate not exempt by law.

Mr. SARGENT. Then that was adopted?

Mr. BAYARD. That, I understand, was the amendment adopted by the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. Then the Secretary is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary is right.

Mr. BAYARD. The second amendment was to affect the rate of the taxation on personalty, and that I sought to effect by inserting in line 94, after the word "law," "and on the personal property of residents $1 on every $100."

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] to my distinct recollection, asked the Chair to have the amendment divided, as he had a right to do, and that the question first to be taken on the rate, whether the tax should be $2 or $1.50, which was a separate point, and the Chair, as I recollect, so stated it from the chair when he put the question. The Senate, therefore, divided the proposition so as to first consider merely the rate without any reference to what class of property it applied to, and on that we took the vote.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to suggest that this is not a matter of any practical importance at all, because if Senators have voted under a misapprehension any Senator can move to reconsider the vote by which this amendment was agreed to. But having sat here as an attentive witness of the whole thing, I think there can be no question that the Senator from Delaware is exactly right in his narrative, and that the Chair and the Secretary are right. The Senator from Delaware moved an amendment which had two members. The first member, confining the reduction to real estate, placed it at $1.50 per hundred; the second member of the amendment, dealing with the next line. The words "and personal" before "estate" have been struck out as a part of the first motion, of course, as must necessarily have been done, in order to point at real estate alone this reduction to $1.50. Everbody will see that the Senator from Delaware would have stultified himself if he had moved his amendment to reduce the rate to $1.50 as to real and personal estate and then followed it with the latter part of his amendment putting personal estate at $1 per hundred. The absurdity of that is so manifest that it must be clear that he intended his reduction of $1.50 to apply to real estate, because the reduction he proposed was to $1 as to personal estate. Therefore he was compelled to move to sever personal property from real estate in the first member of his amendment. That he did. The second member was to interpose in line 94 again the words "personal property" and attribute to them another maximum valuation, to-wit, $1 per hundred. The Senator from Maine demanded a division of the question, as he had a right to do. What was the division? Of course between the first member of the amendment and the second member; and the Chair put, as the Chair was compelled to put, the question on the first half of the amendment, and that was carried in the Senate. Now, it turns out that the Senate did not understand that they were striking out the words "and personal" before "estate." Very well. That is no occasion, I submit, to finding any fault with the Chair or with ourselves, but it is the easiest thing in the world for some Senator to move to reconsider, and let the vote be taken over again.

Mr. ALLISON. I make that motion.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me a minute, I wish to say for myself that although I voted from a sofa, some distance away, as I was diverted for the moment, I did not vote under any misapprehension at all. I voted intending to strike out by my vote, if enough others voted with me, the words "and personal," so as to fix the maximum assessment of real estate, and that only, at $1.50. Therefore I expressed exactly my purpose; but if any other Senator did not express his, that is a reason for moving to reconsider.

Mr. HAMLIN. We shall reach a solution of our difficulties under the motion which the Senator from Iowa has submitted. But still before we vote upon that proposition I want to say precisely how I understand this thing. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Delaware had three distinct propositions in it, clearly, because an amendment may be subdivided into as many questions as will allow either to be carried and maintain the harmony and purpose of the measure, and leave the measure complete if either shall be adopted or rejected. Under that general view of parliamentary law there were three distinct propositions in the amendment submitted by the Senator from Delaware. The first was to reduce the rate of taxation from $2 to $1.50 per hundred. Another was to strike out the words "and personal." It will be recollected by the Senate that the position which I assumed was distinctly that I was in favor of reducing the taxation on real estate from $2 on the hundred to $1.50, and that I was distinctly opposed to reducing the taxation upon personal property from one dollar and a half to one dollar; and I therefore asked for a division of the question.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator was against the last proposition of the amendment?

Mr. HAMLIN. I was against the last proposition in the amendment, and I was against so much of the first proposition as connected itself with the last one. It would have been nonsense for me to have voted to strike out the words "and personal" if I meant to carry out the suggestion which I made of a division and to make it in harmony. Although I did not state precisely where I wanted the amendment divided, the whole scope of what I said was clear, if I could make anything clear, that I wanted a vote simply on reducing taxation from $2 to $1.50, and that was precisely what I supposed I was voting upon.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. He is a very old parliamentarian. The Senator from Delaware says he offered this amendment so that real estate should not be taxed more than $1.50 and personal property not more than $1. Now will my friend say that this whole Senate had the power to deprive him of the right of a vote upon that amendment? Had he not a right to a vote whether there should a distinction between these two kinds of property and whether the maximum on one should be $1.50 and on the other $1, whereas my friend will say, on the line of his argument now, that the Senator from Delaware would have been compelled to submit to a vote on $1.50 as applied to all property whatever, without ever being able to put to the Senate the very thing that he sought to put, namely, whether real estate should be valued in that way or not?

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator from New York, notwithstanding his almost uniform clearness, surprises me by his statement. Who would deprive the Senator from Delaware of a vote upon his proposition? Certainly I would not; and certainly if I would I could not. I would deprive him of a compound vote, a vote upon two propositions at the same time. If the question had been put, as I supposed it would be, to reduce the rate of taxation to $1.50, then would have come the second vote on striking out the words "and personal."

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was put that way.

Mr. HAMLIN. And the Senator from Delaware would have gotten his vote precisely as he wanted it, only it would have taken two votes to have reached the point, and that is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves to reconsider the vote by which the first amendment of the Senator from Delaware was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To save all trouble about that, I suggest that, by unanimous consent it be taken that this vote that has been had was only on the question of striking out "$2" and inserting "$1.50" in the ninety-second line.

Mr. CONKLING. On all property alike?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh no, I will not consent to that, because I did not vote so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will kindly allow me one minute, then the next question of the divided questions left will be whether we are to strike out the words "and personal" before "estate" in the ninety-third line.

Mr. HOAR. A very quick way of getting at this whole matter would be to let the vote stand and then move to strike out the word "real;" so that it would read:

That the rate of taxation in any year shall not exceed $1.50 on every $100 of estate not exempt by law, &c.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the trouble about that would be on the part of our friends on the other side; they would say "We have just put in 'real' and cannot move to strike it out."

Mr. HOAR. It was not put in. That word was in the amendment reported by the committee. I think that would be the simplest and shortest way to reach the matter.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let me suggest to the Senator from Iowa that he ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to regard the vote as reconsidered by which the amendment of the Senator from Delaware was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very good.

Mr. ALLISON. That is precisely my motion. If everybody votes for it, of course it will be by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to reconsidering the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Delaware was adopted? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now, I ask for a distinct vote on the first part of the proposition, to wit, on striking out "$2" and inserting "$1.50."

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York will state his point of order.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask that the amendment of the Senator from Delaware be read. I may want to offer an amendment some time myself; and I want to know whether the mover of an amendment has any rights which a Senator is bound to respect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware will please state his amendment, that it may be seen whether it conforms to what the Secretary has taken down.

Mr. CONKLING. Why not have the Secretary read the amendment as taken down, and then the Senator from Delaware will see whether it is right or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be pursued. The Secretary will read the amendment submitted by the Senator from Delaware, as taken down.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment as proposed was to strike out, in line 92, the words "two dollars" and insert "one dollar and fifty cents;" in line 93, to strike out the words "and personal;" and after the word "law," in line 94, to insert "on the personal property of residents, $1 on every hundred dollars."

Mr. CONKLING. Now I want to state my question of order, not because I attach much importance to it here. The Senator from Delaware may not, but I do, attach a great deal of importance to preserving in every deliberative body the right of every member to move an amendment which is in order and obtain the judgment of the body upon that amendment. It is subject to be divided, and into as many members as it has substantive propositions; and I use the language of the parliamentary law when I make that statement. Now the Senator from Delaware moves an amendment which has two effects, and only two; it has two substantive propositions. The first is to confine within a limit of one dollar and a half the possible assessment of taxes on real estate. That is all there is of it. The second proposition in his amendment is to subject personal property to a different rate of maximum, to wit, the maximum of one dollar in a hundred.

Mr. BAYARD. And to confine it to the personal property of residents.

Mr. CONKLING. I state only the operative words germane to my point. Now what does the division demanded by the Senator from Maine propose to do? Manifestly to deprive the Senator from Delaware of the right which lies at the foundation of his proceedings. What is that? To have the judgment of the Senate, not upon a compound proposition as the Senator from Maine says; no such right as that exists; but to have the judgment of the Senate upon every substantive proposition as he propounds it. Now suppose this is to be divided by taking the vote first upon one dollar and fifty cents, depriving the mover of the right to say that it shall be real estate thus treated; suppose that is done; on what do we vote, on what do I vote when my name is called? I vote whether in respect of all property alike, real and personal, one dollar and fifty cents is to be the maximum. It may be answered "why the Senate afterward will proceed to vote upon the residue of the amendment, and perhaps the Senate will vote in favor of the residue, and then that one dollar and fifty cents will become operative only upon real estate alone." But the other argument is just as strong: suppose the Senate then, on the next member, as the Senator from Maine calls it, of the proposition, to wit eliminating the words "and personal," refuses to strike out those words, what is the effect? I for example have voted to make one dollar and fifty cents the maximum upon real and personal estate alike, whereas that is not what I mean by my vote at all. I mean to vote that in respect of real estate alone one dollar and fifty cents shall be the maximum; but says my honorable friend from Maine I shall not have a chance to vote that; "I will make you vote piecemeal; you should vote in the first place on the $1.50 and then the Senate will determine afterward whether that is to apply to personal property or real estate as to the vote which has already been taken." Can that be? Here stands in the bill a provision touching neat-cattle and sheep. I want to amend as to neat-cattle, and I make my amendment apply to that; but the Senator from Maine says no, that amendment must be voted on all alike, and then afterward the Senate will pass upon the question how much of application the amendment is to have.

Mr. President, I submit that the Senator from Delaware has a right to move in proper form—and if he is out of order, a question of order should be made upon him—to make the valuation, the assessment of real estate, after one rate, and of personal property after another, if he chooses to do so. I think he has exerted that right properly in the amendment which he offered, which simply separates the two things. If he has, then the only division to which his amendment can be subjected is that customary division which enables the vote to be taken separately on the two propositions; but it cannot be so subdivided as to require him to take a vote upon one-half of his one proposition, not knowing whether the effect of it will be to attribute those words to the kind of property to which he wishes to affix them, or whether it is to be to spread them over all kinds of assessable property indiscriminately.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it seems to me very clear that I could not have reached the object I designed unless the amendment had been to strike out and insert as I proposed to do. The object was stated distinctly, to make a difference between the rate of taxation upon real and upon personal property. In order to make a division, the rate of taxation had first to be offered, and then the property to be exempted from it had to be stricken out also; otherwise the manifest single object of my amendment could not have been accomplished. I therefore submit to the honorable Senator from Maine that if he desires to have the rate of taxation upon personal property one dollar and a half, as well as upon real property at one dollar and a half, it can be accomplished by allowing the record of the Senate to stand as it now is and moving to amend the last amendment offered by me by inserting the words "and one-half" after the words "one dollar." The bill will read if so amended—

That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $1.50 on every $100 of real estate not exempt by law, and $1.50 on every $100 of personal property of residents, according to the cash valuation thereof.

That is the object I suppose the Senator from Maine has, to have the rate of taxation upon real and personal property the same, and that can be accomplished in the way I have suggested without any obscurity whatever. But it is perfectly clear to me that to make an intelligible proposition and get the vote on it which I desired—and I was entirely in order—it was necessary to strike out and insert in the manner I proposed; otherwise the object of the amendment would have been frustrated.

Mr. DORSEY. Mr. President, I should like to inquire what is before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. DORSEY. I should like to have the amendment reported.

Mr. SARGENT. His amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. His amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Maine asks to have that divided, I understand; if he does not I do; so as to take the question first on striking out in line 92 the words "two dollars," and inserting the words "one dollar and fifty cents."

Mr. HOAR. I understand a question of order is made by the Senator from New York as to the right to have this amendment divided for a separate vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware stated that the object of the amendment is to fix one rate of taxation upon real estate and another rate upon personal property——

Mr. HOAR. Before the Chair rules, I ask leave to say a word on the question of order, if the Chair please, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from New York.

As I understand, the rule of the Senate provides for preserving the right of any Senator to have one proposition voted upon together, not separated into members, by providing that there shall be no division of a motion to strike out and insert. Now, the Senator from Delaware could, if he chose, have moved to strike out this proviso, the whole four lines of it, and insert his reconstructed proviso exactly in accordance with his desire, and in that case he would have accomplished the object of having one vote, and no Senator could have deprived him of it. But if instead of doing that he puts his motion into three separate motions to strike out and insert in substance, that is to strike out three different parts of the section and insert something in the three different parts of the section in place of what is stricken out, then the question of whether that is a divisible motion must be determined, not by the desire of the individual mover, but by the sense of the subject-matter which is moved.

It is very clear that to strike out "$2" and insert "$1.50" may be desired by all the Senate, without desiring to separate real and personal estate in that particular. The Senate, therefore, might adopt the first one and vote down the other two, and make a substantial and sensible grammatical change in the bill. So they might adopt the second motion to strike out the words "and personal." That, then, would leave the rate of taxation fixed by the bill to apply to real estate only and the limit of personal estate stand under the general law, that is, without any limitation except the necessities of the assessment. And so as to the third.

I submit, then, that as this amendment has been moved, it is clearly the right of any Senator to have a separate vote upon each of the three propositions. The Senator from Delaware could have accomplished his purpose of having one vote on the whole only by striking out the proviso and reconstructing it.

Mr. BAYARD. I think I will relieve the Senate of any doubt upon the subject by offering the following as a substitute for the amendment now pending; this is to take the place of the proviso beginning at line 91 and ending at line 94. I send the proposed substitute to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the proviso commencing in line 91 and ending in line 94, in the following words:

Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $2 on every $100 of real and personal estate not exempt by law, according to the cash valuation thereof.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $1.50 on every $100 of real estate not exempt by law, and on personal property of residents $1 on every $100, according to the cash valuation thereof.

Mr. SARGENT. Now I move to amend after the words "one dollar," in the last clause, by inserting "and fifty cents."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware having withdrawn his previous amendment and submitted a substitute for the proviso, the Senator from California moves to amend that amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What has become of the question of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That fell with the withdrawal of the amendment originally offered, no vote having been taken on it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I ask again to have the question divided, and that the question be first taken on striking out in line 92 the words "two dollars" and inserting the words "one dollar and fifty cents."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment as now submitted.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand the question now to be on the adoption of the substitute I have offered for the proviso.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair understands, and the Secretary will read it.

The Chief Clerk again read the amendment last submitted by Mr. BAYARD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks for a division under the rules. The question now will be on the first member of the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. I want to know the division which the Senator from Vermont demands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read to the point dividing the real from personal estate, as the Chair understands.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $1.50 on every $100 of real estate not exempt by law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is the division, as the Chair understands.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that the Senator's demand?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No. What I ask under the rules, to get a ruling of the Chair, is to divide the question so as to take the judgment of the Senate on the rate alone, without reference to what it applies to, as I stated. I want the vote taken first on that part of the proposition which proposes to change "$2" to "$1.50" where it first occurs. That is what I ask.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Delaware to move to strike out certain words and insert what has been read at the desk.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; that is his motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Vermont asks a division of the words sent up by the Senator from Delaware, as read by the Secretary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I desire to take the vote first on the first part.

Mr. HOAR. I submit that there is no matter to divide.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no motion to strike out these words alone, but to strike out other words with them. The Chair will have the amendment divided, as it contains two substantial propositions. A division of them the Chair will entertain and put the motion on the first, which the Secretary will read.

Mr. HOAR. I call the attention of the Chair to the thirty-first rule of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I withdraw my demand for a division, as I do not want to trouble the Senate with any more pauses; but I now understand the motion to be to strike out the first proviso entirely and insert another.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair understands, and he was about to have it read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now in order to perfect the part of the section proposed to be stricken out, I move to strike out in line 92 the words "two dollars" and insert the words "one dollar and fifty cents."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order.

Mr. CONKLING. Now the rest of us would like to know what has become of the demand for a division.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have withdrawn it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to strike out "two dollars" and insert "one dollar and fifty cents" in the text of the section.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President, I am of the opinion that we could get through with this difficulty very soon by allowing ourselves to take a vote on the question now suggested by the Senator from Vermont.

I will say right here that I do not think the Senate is prepared to vote a different rate of taxation on different kinds of property. The vote that was given did not seem to me to indicate so. Nor am I able to see any good reason why it should be so. What is the proposition? That if one man owns a city lot here worth a thousand dollars, he shall pay $15 tax; if he owns a carriage and horses worth a thousand dollars, he shall pay $10, or if he has a thousand dollars cash in bank, he shall pay $10, while the city-lot man pays $15. Does the Senate propose to make a rate of taxation on real property that shall be higher than on money or bank stock? Suppose one man has a thousand dollars of bank stock, do you propose that he shall get off with two-thirds of the tax imposed on a man who owns an acre of ground worth $1,000? Is that the proposition? If so, I must have some reason before I can vote to make a distinction. If a man owns one hundred dollars' worth of property at the cash value of it, let him pay tax on that $100 of property no matter what it is in, whether in dollars or in stock or in horses or in land. If we can come to a vote on the rate we shall fix on the property, it seems to me that certainly ought to settle all of this question. It will so far as I am concerned at any rate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, to strike out in line 92 the words "two dollars" and insert "one dollar and fifty cents."

Mr. INGALLS. On which I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Allison,	Conkling,	Jones of Florida,	Patterson,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to amend in line 98 by striking out the words "and fifty cents" so that "upon property without the limits of the city of Washington and Georgetown, and to be so designated by the assessors in their annual return, the rate for any one year shall not exceed" $1 on every $100. That maintains the proportion between the city part of the District and the rural portion of the District that was designed by the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Delaware that that motion is not in order. It is not included in the words proposed to be stricken out by the previous amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, (to Mr. BAYARD.) Let us vote on your other proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out certain words and inserting what the Senator from Delaware sent to the desk previously, the text of which has been modified by striking out "$1" and inserting "1.50. The question now recurs on striking out those words as amended, and inserting what the Senator proposes.

Mr. BAYARD. My object has been anticipated to a certain extent. Will the Clerk be kind enough to read the provision as now amended by the last vote of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the clause as amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proviso, as amended, reads:

Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $1.50 on every $100 of real and personal estate not exempt by law, according to the cash valuation thereof.

It is proposed to amend that proviso by striking out all after the word "provided," and inserting:

That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $1.50 on every $100 of real estate not exempt by law, and on personal property of residents $1 on every $100, according to the cash valuation thereof.

Mr. SARGENT. I move an amendment to that to make the last "dollar" "one dollar and fifty cents."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment to that amendment is to insert after the word "dollar" where it last occurs the words "and fifty cents." The question is on this amendment of the Senator from California to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. INGALLS. As I do not own any property in this city and have no residence here, I presume that I can vote without any considerations other than those affecting the public welfare. I trust, before this amendment is adopted making a distinction between real and personal property, that some Senator will give a good reason why real and personal property, both being equally visible, and both being equally valuable, and both receiving equally the protection of the law, should not pay equally the expenses of administering the law.

I understood the Senator from Delaware to say a short time since that a tax on personal property was illusory. I wish the Senator from Delaware would explain what he means by "illusory." I suppose he means that men who own personal property, rich men that have mortgages and securities and bonds and money in bank, lie about it to the assessor. If that is what the Senator from Delaware means by speaking of the personal tax as being illusory, I agree with him. But is it any reason because men who have property invested in the accumulations of others conceal it, commit perjury about it, refuse to allow it to be listed for taxation, why the Senate of the United States should refuse to say that when it can be discovered it should bear its proper proportion of taxation? The principle of equality in taxation is the one that ought to control; it is the one that political economists in every age have sought to apply; and here at this period of the nineteenth century there is an attempt being made in the Senate to show that this distinction, which is based solely on the criminal purposes of others, shall be enacted into the law of the land.

I confess, sir, that I am surprised that this distinction should be attempted to be made here. As the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. SAUNDERS] stated a few moments ago, what is the reason that if a man has a piece of real estate worth a thousand dollars he should pay $15 tax upon it, and if the same man or his neighbor has a carriage and horses worth a thousand dollars he should pay $10 tax upon them? Is there any reason to be given for that, or are we to say because the man that has the horses and carriage sees fit the day before the tax is levied to drive them out of the District that we are going to legalize his effort to escape? I hope not, sir. I trust, therefore, before the Senate commits itself to this proposition, we shall hear some reason given why personal property should not bear its proper share of the expenses of Government.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas has declared his perfect impartiality in this case, because he is totally without real or personal property in this District, and therefore he considers that he is without interest in this District as to either real or personal estate and hence peculiarly fitted to enact justice toward both. I hope that I am not wholly disqualified from voting upon bills laying taxes in the District of Columbia, by reason of owning a private residence in the District; but if I were, the taxation which I have advocated is of a greater rate against the only property of mine that can be taxed than upon other property upon which I am not liable to taxation in the District. My domicile not being in this city, I apprehend the power to tax my personal property does not exist here; but it follows my person and is taxed in the place of my domicile. So in the amendment which I was offering I was voting a greater tax upon property which I did own than upon that which I did not own.

But, Mr. President, why is it that a tax upon personal property is more illusory, to use my own phrase, than upon real estate? Simply because the real estate is visible, is appreciable, is tangible; and the personal property is not. It suited the fine imagination of the Senator to suppose rich men swearing falsely in regard to their estates. I made no suggestion of the kind. I simply said that the officers of the law could not judge so well of that which they did not see and could not touch. All history has told you that the justest tax in theory was the income tax, and the falsest, most unjust in its practical operations. The history of every country, and of our own, which has tried it, has disclosed the fact that it will not do to place the support of the Government upon voluntary contribution, and that as personal property in its various forms of securities for the payment of debts is invisible, intangible, and unascertainable, it is a most illusory basis for obtaining taxation. It is fleeting; it passes from hand to hand by delivery; its amount cannot be ascertained; you are put upon a system of inquisition that is repugnant to the whole theory of our social lives and our political government; and you have no certainty, no reliability as to the truth of the returns made. The experience of this country and the experience of every country is the best answer to the Senator from Kansas. Taxation and legislation are certainly practical affairs; and a man who will pursue theory in either without regard to practical results, will find himself a very unwise law-maker.

There are many of the States where the attempt to tax personal property has been given over altogether. There are no States where such taxes are laid that they are not found to be very ineffectual in the production of revenue. The great merit in a revenue is to have it certain, so that all property can pay its share; but no form of taxation ever has been devised and successfully practiced that can compel taxation upon property capable of secretion; that is why in this case, desiring this District to flourish, desiring that wholesome and practical laws should govern it, I suggested that you should tax that property which you can compel to render the burden that you have apportioned to it, and not to tax another class of property which you will have no means of compelling to bear the tax. I meant to be practical, and I meant to be just, and I believe my amendment to have effected both.

Mr. EATON. Only a word, Mr. President. I confess I am somewhat astonished at the reasoning of my friend from Delaware. I from his stand-point should say that the rate of taxation on personal property ought to be double what it is on real estate, so as to catch something that was good. His argument affords no reason to my mind why there should be a less per centum on personalty; on the contrary it should be larger. I am not aware of any State in the Union—yet I do not undertake to say there is not one—where there is a distinction between property in taxation; there is none in my State. Not only that, we make very stringent laws; we give the assessors power to add to the list of personal property. If there be any reason to suppose that a man is worth a large amount of personal property that he fails to put in his list, then the assessors force him to swear to the list, and they add to it until they are satisfied with the size of his list.

I trust there will be no distinction made here, but whatever we can catch of personal property in the District of Columbia let us catch it, or else the United States will be compelled next year to pay an additional hundred, or two hundred, or three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HEREFORD. I agree with the Senator who has just taken his seat that according to the argument of the Senator from Delaware, according to the logic advanced by him, there should be a greater taxation placed upon personal property than on real estate. He says that a greater rate should be placed on real estate because it is tangible, and less upon personal property because, to use his own phrase, it is illusory; you cannot get at it; in other words, parties owning personal property conceal it. I cannot see upon what principle the Senator from Delaware shall say that a banker who has a million of dollars in his vaults and a million more loaned out shall pay a less rate of taxation than the man who owns the building in which he has his bank. I cannot see why the man who owns his fine horses and carriage and diamonds shall pay a less tax than the man who owns real estate.

There is another reason why, if we are to make any difference, personal property should pay more than real estate. In addition to this general tax upon real estate there are special assessments upon real estate here. Besides the tax upon a block upon an avenue or street of one dollar and a half, where you improve that avenue or that street, that same property has to pay an additional special assessment for that improvement. So that, even if you make them both a dollar and a half, the real estate then pays more than the personal property; and so far as my information goes the amendment sought to be incorporated in this bill by the Senator from Delaware is entirely novel. As far as I know, it is contrary to the legislation of all the States of this Republic to make a distinction between personal and real estate when you come to make property bear the burdens of government. I know of no State, of no Territory, where there is a distinction made. One man may prefer to have his wealth in Government bonds; they do not pay a dollar of taxation to-day. He may own a million dollars in Government bonds to-day, and he does not pay a dollar of tax upon them; yet the man within whose house he lives pays a dollar and a half on the one hundred dollars under this bill. And by this proposition sought to be incorporated into the bill by the Senator from Delaware, if the man who owns those bonds also has a million of dollars in bank or loaned out, he seeks to make him not only free from paying upon those bonds in any shape, manner, or form, but to make him also pay a less rate of taxation upon the million dollars he has in the vaults of the bank or loaned out. I see no fairness, no justice in it, and I know of no precedent for it, as far as my reading has gone.

I hope that the amendment will not prevail, but that the two species of property will pay the same tax; that is fair; that is just.

Mr. KERNAN. It seems to me that whatever personal property is subjected to taxation should be taxed at the same rate on its value as real estate. The argument of my friend from Delaware goes too far. It would require us to exempt personal property entirely, because it is illusory. A man who will prevaricate and cheat for the sake of saving a dollar and a half on the hundred I think will do it for a dollar on the hundred, which is the proposition we are asked to vote. I think it is entirely just and right that whatever personal property is subjected to taxation by our law should be taxed at the same rate as is real estate on the value. I know of no State which exempts personal property from taxation. I know that some States do authorize a man on his oath to declare the amount of his indebtedness, and allow him to have that amount deducted from the assessed value of his personal property; but I know of no State where they make a difference in the rate of tax on whatever is subject to taxation, and I do not think we should make a difference in this bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I ask that my amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from California to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "dollar," in the sixth line of the amendment, it is proposed to insert "and fifty cents."

Mr. SARGENT. I desired that it might be reported on account of the manner in which it was stated before. The object of that amendment is to put the same rate of taxation upon personal property as upon real. The proposition has been so fully argued that I will not say anything more except to direct attention that that is the object of my amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the text which is proposed to be stricken out by adding to it:

There shall be exempted from taxation, in addition to what is now exempt by law, $1,000 in value of the homestead of a householder having a family: Provided, Such homestead be not of the value of more than $3,000 in all.

Mr. President, I differ from the Senator from Delaware in thinking that a just public policy requires the exemption of personal property from its full and equal share of the burdens of taxation. But after exempting such personal property as the interests of very poor men require should be exempted, like the household furniture and articles of special household value, it seems to me that a just public policy requires that next in order of exemption should come the homestead of small householders. If there is any one thing which we can promote and foster by judicious laws, both as to taxation and as to the use of the public lands, it is the multiplication throughout this country, whether in cities or on the frontier, of that class of persons who have the stake in the country which is constituted by the possession of a home which they own. I am surprised in looking over the tax-list of this District, to find that no provision has been made for lightening the burdens of taxation upon the small householders. The real estate is visible; the tax upon it is a taxation in rem. No matter where the title may be or where the owner may dwell, the inexorable law comes down; there is no difficulty or possibility of a mistake in its enforcement; and as the Senator from Delaware has said, the power of concealment of personal property or the power of change of residence by the owners of large amounts of personal property who select for their dwelling-place places where taxes are light or where they can make illegal bargains with assessors, brings an unequal share of the burden of taxation everywhere in this country upon the real estate occupied by the poor.

Now, I trust no Senator will object to an amendment to this text, which provides that in the case of that class of householders having families whose homestead is less than $3,000 in value, $1,000 of that value shall be exempted from the burdens of public taxation. It is an exemption which exists in most of the States now in regard to the liability to seizure on execution. It does not exist in the District of Columbia. It seems to me that no Senator will desire to impose the burdens of public taxation upon this class of homes. It is especially important in this District where, owing to the exigencies of the war, there flocked in here in the last years of the war and since a large number of colored persons who had been slaves and whose habits as to industry, frugality, care for themselves, remained to be formed under the new circumstances which encountered them; and the encouragement of that class of persons especially to acquire and hold homes, is certainly a very important consideration in framing our tax policy. I feel quite sure that the Senator who has this bill in charge, representing as he does a State which has been so distinguished for the liberality of its homestead laws and which is reaping the benefit of that liberality to-day in the great immigration which is flocking there of workingmen from all parts of the world—I feel quite sure that that Senator will concur in the policy of this amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator if there is any instance within his knowledge in which homesteads are exempted from taxation in any of the States?

Mr. HOAR. I think so; but I cannot answer the question definitely at this moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know any.

Mr. KERNAN. Does the Senator profess to know of any State where they exempt a homestead from taxation, even although it may be exempted from the payment of other debts? I never heard of any such thing.

Mr. HOAR. I will answer that question in this way: I understand that in some of the States at any rate, as in the District of Columbia, there is exempted from taxation what is exempted from levy on execution. That is the present law of the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What?

Mr. HOAR. Yes; that is the present provision of the law, which I will read. Among the exemptions in the statute of 1876, chapter 180, I find the following:

Fifthly, all property exempt by law from execution, including all libraries or books in use and not held for sale, &c.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now what is exempted from execution?

Mr. HOAR. As I have already stated, homesteads are not exempted from execution in this District. If they were, as they should be, this amendment would not be needed. They are exempt from execution in many of the States of the Union.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But in none of the States, in my opinion, are they exempted from taxation. If homesteads here were exempt from execution, then the question would be, as it is in every State, whether they shall also be exempt from taxation; so that my friend's argument would be this: because some property is exempt from execution, therefore homesteads ought to be; and inasmuch as homesteads then would be, and whatever is exempt from execution is under the tax levy of 1876 exempt from taxation, therefore homesteads would be! That is rather a long, far-away argument. I do not think in any State, even that which has been most liberal as to homesteads as well as that which has been most stringent, it has ever been seriously suggested that the homesteader, who is protected from the rapacity of his creditors, should not contribute his share, according to what he has, to his own protection.

Mr. INGALLS. The tribute which the Senator from Massachusetts has paid to the liberality and the public spirit of the citizens of Kansas is merited. They have exhibited greater generosity toward the citizens of the rest of the Republic than probably any of her sister States in the Union. They have made the most liberal exemption from execution; they have made the most liberal provisions for education; and as a necessary consequence, people from Massachusetts and elsewhere are flocking there in immense numbers, swelling our population by thousands every day. I may add also that the prospect of the crops for the ensuing year is extraordinarily good, and we hope more will follow those who are already coming. But the people of Kansas, generous as they are, have never made any homestead provision that exempted the property occupied by the homestead from taxation. We have provided that one hundred and sixty acres of farming land and not to exceed an acre in any incorporated town or village, irrespective of value, shall be exempt from seizure or levy and sale upon execution; but we have never provided that it should never be taxed, because the idea is that the homestead, like many other species of property, receives the benefits of Government aid and must bear its share of the expenses. I cannot, therefore, notwithstanding the touching appeal of the Senator from Massachusetts, consent to accept his amendment to the bill. I trust it will be voted down by the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I ought, perhaps, to have said, in response to the Senator from Vermont, that while I am not able, in answer to the question which he put and which the Senator from New York also put, to say that in any State in the Union the special exemption in the form in which I have moved it of the homestead is made—and I do not know whether that is or is not true—yet it is true that in nearly all the States of the Union an exemption of the property of poor persons to the extent of a thousand dollars or more prevails; that is, the principle of exempting a thousand dollars in value of the property of poor persons. In my own State, for example—and my impression is that it applies as well to personal as to real estate—the property of widows and certain enumerated persons, children under twenty-one, is exempted to the amount of a thousand dollars. In my State a thousand dollars of the earnings or income from property is exempt by express provision of law. That applies to poor and rich alike, so far as the earnings of a trade, occupation, or business are concerned.

Now, therefore, although it may be true that the particular and humane exemption of the home of the small householder is not the form which State legislation has taken in getting at that result, that certainly is a better and wiser form, I submit to the Senate, than any other mode in which it can be accomplished. It seems to me that to propose to exempt (which has been done by a vote of the Senate, now reconsidered, it is true) the property of the millionaire, or to lower the rate on that to a dollar—for that is the pending amendment—while you leave the shanty of the poor negro, which is worth seven hundred or eight hundred or five hundred dollars, to bear its full value, the inexorable law to come down upon it while you lower the rate on the hoard of the millionaire and tax that only to the extent of one dollar on the hundred while this class of persons pay on their dwellings a dollar and a half, is a proposition that ought not to meet with favor. And I submit, sir, that independently of precedent, independently of the question whether any State has or has not adopted this particular mode of exempting the property of the poor, it is eminently just and right, and that no reasonable argument can be adduced against it; that in the peculiar circumstances of this District especially this exemption should be made.

There is no one thing which will insure the safety of this country in the future, there is no one thing which a humane and just public policy should aim at, there is no one thing which will tend to turn into intelligent trustworthy patriots, whose attachment to the country and whose wise share in the government of the country is to make all secure, a large class of our citizens, so much as converting them into householders and having cluster about their dwelling-place those attachments and affections which extend from the dwelling-place to the country. I submit, independently of precedent, that unless some serious reason can be given to the contrary, if anywhere, for any reason, any class of property is to be exempt from its share of the public burdens, the class of property with which you should begin is the home of the poor man to this slight extent.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I cannot support the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not believe that in our legislation we should undertake to discriminate between poor men and rich men, but apply the law with an equal hand to all classes of our citizens. Now if we establish this exemption in this District the people in the States will become acquainted with it and they will begin to inquire if the same measure cannot be extended to them. We had better not do it. There is great dissatisfaction now throughout the country with the munificence of Congress toward the people of this District; and to extend it further will increase that dissatisfaction. Let the people of this District stand upon the same equality that the people of the several States stand upon.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator one question in connection with what he is saying?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Does he agree with his colleague that the million dollars of personal property of the banker should be exempt to the extent of 50 per cent.?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know that the Senator from Massachusetts rightly represents the views of my colleague. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I always agree with my colleague when I think he is right, and I oppose him when I think he is wrong; and I oppose the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts because I think it is wrong in itself. It is an attempt to discriminate between the citizens of this country, and I think the people of this country have been educated in that direction long enough. We have heard of the eight-hour labor law for certain classes of men, and we have pandered to that feeling until to-day we are beholding some of the fruits of that doctrine springing up throughout the length and breadth of this land. Let us teach the people of this country that we intend to be just toward every class of citizens, and intend to grant immunities and exclusive favors to none.

Sir, I am as sympathetic for the poor man as the Senator from Massachusetts; but I do not want by any action of mine to teach the people of this country that we are to be unjust to one class of men in order to be benevolent toward another. Taxation has got to be paid, and if it is not paid by all equally, then a certain portion of the people have got to pay it. Let us all bear our equal proportion, and I venture to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that no part of the people of this country when impressed with the idea that exact justice is done to them will demur to our doing it. I cannot vote for that proposition.

In reference to the question of exempting personal property I hesitate in my mind as to whether that is right or not. I do not know that a man who has his estate in personal property ought to be exempt from taxation because he has his property in that peculiar form. I am willing, therefore, that the tax if arranged at $1.50 per $100 shall apply both to personal and real estate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. HOAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest to the Senator from California to accept an amendment by striking out the words "of residents" and inserting the words "not taxed elsewhere," in order to avoid a discrimination that might arise upon the meaning of the word "residents."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is part of the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SARGENT. I call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to the suggestion. It is no part of my amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. The language of the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware imposes a tax upon the personal property of residents. I propose to strike out the words "of residents" and insert the words "not taxed elsewhere," so that the amendment will read that this taxation shall be imposed upon personal property not taxed elsewhere.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not think that necessary at all. The taxation of personal estate certainly follows the person. Where there are poll taxes and personal taxes of any kind, they must be imposed on a man at his domicile. The domicile attaches to it all his personal property which is properly assessable. But whether he shall keep in securities or in other forms his property here or elsewhere, he is taxed at his domicile according to his property; and this provides for that. I think the phraseology proposed by the Senator from Kansas is not as inclusive as he would wish and what I propose is more inclusive of taxation.

Mr. INGALLS. I have talked within a few moments with two members of the Senate who have personal property here. One of them states to me that his personal property is taxed in the State where he resides, and the other states that he pays tax on his personal property here. It is evidently unjust that the Senator who pays taxes where he resides upon his personal property should be subjected to another tax here, or that it should be listed here, or that he should be subjected to any annoyance on account of its being here. Therefore it appears to me that if the Senate will adopt this language it will clear the section of any ambiguity or trouble.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator is a resident of Kansas, and there are laws there which tax his personal property, which tax him and embrace all that he is worth in that form. Whether his personal property happens to be in Paris, in London, in Washington, or in Kansas, it is all taxed in Kansas, and he responds there as to personal taxes as a resident of Kansas. Would he propose to submit his personal property to taxation in four different jurisdictions? I apprehend not. A man can have but one domicile, and there he responds to all personal taxation. He draws to his person the right to all his personal property. A man in his domicile is fairly subjected to the operations of its laws, and he owns his property there, just as when a man dies owning personal property in a dozen States it follows the law of taxation where his will is proven and where his domicile was last at the time of his death. I believe the language I have used is the language to be found in similar laws, and I prefer it; and I trust the Senator from Kansas will not urge any amendment to it.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator from Delaware will not accept this as a modification, I cannot offer it now, because I think his amendment is in the second degree, but I will offer it afterward.

Mr. BAYARD. I can see more controversy and more questions about the phraseology the Senator proposes than that which I use, which I think has been the subject of judicial decision, so as to make it very clear to every assessor and every citizen as to what is intended. If a man is not a resident of the District, he does not pay taxes on personal property here, but at the place of his domicile.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware as amended.

Mr. INGALLS. Now, as the rate of taxation upon real and personal property is the same, there is no necessity for having these two different subdivisions of that paragraph in relation to that subject, and I suggest that they be incorporated so that the rate of taxation, instead of being "two dollars," as now fixed in the bill, be reduced to "one dollar and fifty cents."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to strike out the words "of residents" and insert the words "not taxable elsewhere." Now let it be read as it will read if amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. So that if amended the amendment will read:

Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed one dollar and fifty cents on every one hundred dollars of real estate not exempt by law, and on personal property not taxable elsewhere, one dollar and fifty cents on every one hundred dollars, according to the cash valuation thereof.

Mr. BLAINE. I should like to ask how could there be any personal property of a bona fide resident of the District taxable elsewhere?

Mr. INGALLS. I do not know that there could be, but it is very probable that there might be, a great deal of property brought in here by a man who was not a resident of the District that would not be taxed anywhere else.

Mr. BLAINE. They have no right to levy it on them.

Mr. INGALLS. They certainly have a right to levy it; if not, they ought to have it. If a man brings a stock of goods here from France, say, or from England, not a citizen of this country, and sells it here in this city, ought it not to pay tax?

Mr. HOAR. In answer to the question of the Senator from Maine I will say that there is a great deal of personal property in this country that is taxable where it is situated, without regard to the domicile of the owner, as in some States the shares of incorporations.

Mr. BLAINE. Besides national-bank stock, what?

Mr. HOAR. One thing is stocks of goods of merchants for sale, in the State of Massachusetts. Another is farming stock, stocks of cattle and hay on the farm where they are, without regard to the owner's domicile.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. A man may live in Virginia and have a bank here.

Mr. HOAR. So of horses in livery stables.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to offer an amendment to the section. I move to add to the section—

> The collector of taxes, upon the receipt of the duplicate assessment, shall give notice for one week in one newspaper published in the city of Washington that he is ready to receive taxes; and any person who shall, within ten days after such notice given, pay the taxes assessed against him, shall be allowed by the collector a deduction of 5 per cent. on the amount of his or her taxes; and upon the amount so paid in the collector shall receive only one-half commission.

The object of that is that the commissioners may be in receipt of money from the very commencement of the assessment year. If a provision of that kind is adopted, persons taxed will go up and pay at once within the time limited, within the ten days, an amount of money sufficient to enable the commissioners to carry on the affairs of the District.

Then there is another provision, that upon the amount so paid in the collector shall receive but one-half commissions. He ought not to be entitled to full commissions when he has not the trouble of collecting throughout the year. On this amount that is paid in he will be entitled, if the amendment is adopted, to but one-half commissions. I apprehend that would be a saving of $25,000 to the people of the District in the collection of taxes. I understand the collector is now paid by commissions. It would save that much, I think, if there be as liberal an amount paid in as there would be—if at least one-half the taxes were paid in within ten days—under the provision. We have such a provision in reference to our school tax in my town, and I know in that town at least one-half the taxes are paid within the time limited.

Mr. EATON. I think the principle entirely right, but the percentage of 5 per cent. is too much.

Mr. SAULSBURY. In my town we allow a rebate of 10 per cent. It insures prompt payment. If you reduce it too low, then it will not have the effect desired.

Mr. HARRIS. I am authorized by the gentleman in charge of the bill to say that the Committee on the District of Columbia have no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware to strike out the words "or her" after "his." We have a general statute, I I am quite sure, which covers all that; but these words being introduced here in one place might lead to a doubt as to the meaning in other places.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the section as amended.

Mr. BAYARD. Now that the rate of taxation upon real and personal property within the cities has been placed at $1.50 on the hundred, I think that on rural property should be reduced to $1 per hundred. Therefore, on line 98, I move to strike out the words "and fifty cents," so that the rate assessed on property without the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown shall be $1 on every $100. That is the proposition which the committee itself fixed.

Mr. DORSEY. It was the purpose of the Committee on the District of Columbia to provide that property used exclusively for agricultural purposes should pay one-half per cent. less than property in the cities where it has the benefits of police and gas and all those things. I believe in view of that the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware is quite right, and I hope my colleague in charge of the bill will accept the amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have had put in my hand——

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator from Maine will give way to me, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HAMLIN. I yield.

Mr. SARGENT. I submit that motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that this District government bill may be printed as amended as far as we have gone, so that we may see how the sections stand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, there being no objection.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish to know whether the amendment offered to reduce the tax on the rural property of this District has been accepted. ["No!" "No!"]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has not been voted on. It is the pending question. The Senator from California moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 23, 1878.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. S. DOMER, D. D., St. Paul's English Lutheran church, Washington, District of Columbia.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL AND RECORD.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to make a statement in advance in regard to the Journal. Examination of the proceedings as to House bill No. 3390 shows that on the 6th of February House bill No. 3079 was reported from the Judiciary Committee, and on the 25th of the same month House bill No. 3390 was reported as a substitute for that bill and recommitted, upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] entered the motion to reconsider on the 26th of February. The only statement the Chair desires to make is that House bill No. 3390 is the bill that should properly have been brought up upon the motion to reconsider, and formally House bill No. 3079, as amended by the committee, should have been moved as a substitute. The Chair, supposing that this is what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] intended formally to do, has had the Journal made up accordingly. Otherwise there would be a hiatus in the Journal. The Chair makes this explanation in justice to himself and the Clerk.

Mr. BUTLER. The bills are the same in fact.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there is no objection, the Journal will be regarded as approved.

The Chair also desires to state that yesterday House bill No. 721 was reported by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations with a request that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. This bill was reported for the same purpose on the 26th of April, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] a member of the Committee on Appropriations; and the Chair would therefore ask that the action of yesterday be stricken from the Journal.

There being no objection, the Journal was amended accordingly.

The Journal was then approved.

NATIONAL IRON-MOLDERS' UNION.

Mr. MANNING. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 292) to incorporate the National Iron-Molders' Union be taken from the Private Calendar and considered at this time.

Mr. BURCHARD. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BANNING. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will let this bill be considered now. It is a unanimous report from the committee, and I do not think any one will object if he will only examine it and see for himself exactly what it is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection has been made.

Mr. SINGLETON. I rise to a privileged report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio has risen to a privileged report.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of calling up the report from the Committee on Rules, and I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amend Rule 112 by inserting, after the word "made," in line 4, the following: "Or releasing alleged indebtedness to the Government."
> Add to Rule 112 the following: "All bills originating in the Senate appropriating money, land, or property of the United States shall have their first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union or the Committee of the Whole House, and all amendments made to House bills not germane to the subject-matters contained therein as originally passed by the House shall in like manner have their first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union or the Committee of the Whole House."
> Amend Rule 151: after word "report," in last line, insert: "bills or resolutions touching the revenue or public debt at any time, and other bills."
> Amend Rule 119: after the words "appropriation bills," in the second line, insert: "or bills touching the revenue or public debt, and no others."

Mr. SINGLETON. I think this report from the Committee on Rules should be printed and laid on each member's desk, so it can be read and thoroughly understood before it is voted on.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to enter a motion to recommit to the Committee on Rules with instructions to that committee to report an entire revision of the rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. MILLS. Then I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not demand the previous question until that motion can be submitted.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is already a privileged question before the House which must first be disposed of.

Mr. EDEN. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio to let the amendments be again read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask gentlemen to send for the order of business, and they will see the amendments in print. This report was made on the 10th of May and will be found in the RECORD, page 3364. Let gentlemen send for the order of business and they will have the amendments in print before them.

I wish now to say, Mr. Speaker, in these amendments to the rules there are two distinct propositions in no way connected with each other, and the House may agree to one and reject the other, if it shall see fit to do so. They are printed together only because they were reported at the same time. I wish to distinguish between them, and gentlemen may vote against one without voting against the other.

The first amendment to Rule 112 I do not think in effect changes the rule at all, for I understand we can at any time send a Senate bill to the Committee of the Whole that makes an appropriation, upon the point of order. But the Speaker was in doubt whether under certain circumstances he would be authorized to make that ruling, and though most of the members of the Committee of Rules thought he would, yet to settle the doubt we report this amendment making it definite and precise that a Senate amendment having on it matters not germane to the bill which had gone from the House and containing an appropriation might be sent to the Committee of the Whole just as though it were a House measure. But I cannot discuss that; and for myself I do not care whether it is adopted or not, because I think the principle of the rule is just the same as it will be when this amendment is adopted.

Mr. BUCKNER. If the Senate return the river and harbor appropriation bill with amendments making additional appropriations for other works, will that be subject to the point of order it must receive its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. GARFIELD. I think not if it is germane to the general subject, but if they should put on a new topic it would be.

Mr. VANCE. I cannot hear a word that is being said.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio will resume his rent until order is restored and public business will wait the convenience of gentlemen who are discussing in the aisles.

Mr. FRANKLIN. Would it not be well to take a recess for ten minutes?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is in order. The Chair of course does not suppose gentlemen will sit here without conversing, but they can converse in a lower tone of voice. The Chair sits here and hears private conversation distinctly in different parts of the Hall, so he becomes the repository of valuable state secrets perhaps, and gentlemen do not know it. He hopes, therefore, gentlemen will moderate their tone of voice when they engage in conversation. This is only a reasonable request in order that public business may proceed without interruption.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am very sure, after the persuasive language of the Speaker, that he will not need to interrupt the business again for the sake of obtaining order.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask the gentleman from Ohio if he intends to move the previous question after he has explained the amendments or if he proposes to allow discussion to run for some time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot fairly agree to extend discussion longer than a reasonable time for every one to be heard. I do not think we ought to interrupt the consideration of the appropriation bills and other general business very long on a question of this sort.

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman will pardon me I desire to make a suggestion. This report embraces three or four different propositions, and I would suggest that the gentleman should present them to the House in the order in which they are presented in the report, and that the question be taken not on the whole report, but on each proposition.

Mr. GARFIELD. Oh, certainly we ought to vote separately on these propositions, because they are entirely distinct.

I have said all I intended to say in regard to the amendment to Rule 112, and will merely summarize it thus: it provides that, if the Senate shall send us a bill that would be, if arising in the House, subject to the point of order, it shall also be subject to the point of order when it comes here from the Senate; that is all. Or if the Senate amend a House bill, putting on an amendment that if offered in the House could be sent to the Committee of the Whole, that also shall be subject to the point of order here when the bill comes back from the Senate.

Now gentlemen can decide in a minute whether they want that rule to be thus amended or not.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. I would ask the gentleman whether under this amended rule every Senate bill which made any of the changes spoken of here would not have to go to the Committee of the Whole without being first sent to one of the committees of the House?

Mr. GARFIELD. Oh, not necessarily.

Mr. CONGER. I think that would be the effect of requiring that it should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. Sending a bill to a committee of the House is not a consideration. A motion to refer to a committee of the House could be made without raising the question of the bill being liable to the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. Then every bill from the Senate having an amendment of this sort must, on the point of order being made, no matter what the urgency of business may be—no matter whether it is an appropriation bill or something else—must be sent to the Committee of the Whole and take its place there. Under another rule it would be placed at the foot of the Calendar, and could only be reached in Committee of the Whole by laying aside all other business.

I submit to the gentleman that he must see from his knowledge of business that such a rule must necessarily delay business since it will permit any member by making the point of order to send the bill to the Committee of the Whole, no matter what may be the urgency of the business of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. That would be true under the ruling we have always had until this Congress upon that rule. But of course the gentleman from Michigan will remember that in the last six days of the session, when the appropriation bills must be passed, it is always competent to move to suspend the rules.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio what possible benefit is to be derived from sending these measures to the Committee of the Whole on the point of order. Cannot the House consider the propositions just as well in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no other reason in the world for this proposition than the reason we have now for sending bills making appropriations, when they originate here, to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MILLS. But does not such a rule give a disadvantage to the proposition? Does it not tend to defeat the will of the majority of the House?

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose the whole scheme of our rules tends to put a check on the will of the majority to some extent. Still they are necessary in order that we may have a proper mode of transacting business. Personally I do not care whether this rule is adopted or not. I believe the rule is so now. I hold to that clearly; but some of the members of the Committee on Rules think differently.

Mr. MILLS. Is it not equivalent to increasing the chances against a bill to send it to the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. GARFIELD. It has that effect no doubt.

Mr. MILLS. The object of the rule, then, is to defeat the will of the majority of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. The object is to protect the House against amendments that are not germane.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio this question: suppose the Senate put upon the river and harbor bill an amendment of any kind not exactly germane, must not the river and harbor bill then necessarily go to the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose so; but a river and harbor amendment would be germane.

Mr. CONGER. But suppose the Senate saw fit to put on any other little amendment not germane? I conceive this rule will give the power to any one member raising the point of order in the last days of the session to defeat any bill he desires to defeat in this House. Whether this is aimed at the river and harbor bill I do not know, but I have had my suspicion that that is the object of the amendment.

Mr. HOUSE. Several others have had the same suspicion.

Mr. CONGER. Entertaining that view of the proposition when the question came up before I was disposed to oppose it as well as I was able, and I do so now. I submit to the gentleman from Ohio that in these last days of the session there is no great necessity for a change of rules which have been sufficient and satisfactory for years and years. I cannot see the reason of it, unless it has for its object to defeat by the action of one or half a dozen members the will of the majority of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield now for a few moments to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD.]

Mr. BURCHARD. This amendment to rule 112, in my judgment, simply expresses what the rule now requires and it is simply, as I understand the purpose of the rule, to give the interpretation that should be given to the rule, and which was the intention of the rule. It requires that all bills of this character, whether originated in the House or in the Senate, shall receive their first discussion in Committee of the Whole and it seems to me a proper rule. But I want to suggest to my friend from Ohio an amendment to his proposition, and that is to substitute the word "discussion" for the word "consideration," and then it will follow the exact language of Rule 112. There may be a technical difference between the meaning of the words "consideration" and "discussion."

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has suggested that a bill of this character could not be referred to any other committee until it had first been considered in Committee of the Whole. If you follow the language of Rule 112, you will see that it provides that—

All proceedings touching appropriations of money and all bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first discussed in a Committee of the Whole House.

Now in regard to the river and harbor bill, if the majority of the House desire to pass that bill without reference, as the river and harbor bill was passed this session by a majority which was composed, I believe, of three-fourths of the members, then they can do it upon Monday, or within the last six days before the close of the session. A motion to suspend the rules for such a purpose is not subject to this objection, but, in my judgment, any germane amendments—any amendments germane to the river and harbor bill—coming here from the Senate, would not require that the bill, having been once considered in Committee of the Whole or having been passed under a suspension of the rules, would have to be referred to the committee. I will refer to a decision which I think was made when Mr. BLAINE was Speaker, on a bill relating to the currency, which was passed under a suspension of the rules. It went to the Senate, and came back here with amendments, and the Speaker then decided that, the bill having been passed in the House under a suspension of the rules, the rules did not require that it should be considered in Committee of the Whole; that it came back under the action of the House, which had suspended the rules and sent it to the Senate. If that ruling was a correct ruling, and I believe it was, it would dispense with the necessity of sending the river and harbor bill, when returned from the Senate with amendments, to the Committee of the Whole, if it had been considered in Committee of the Whole or passed under a suspension of the rules. I close by suggesting to the gentleman from Ohio that the word "discussion" be substituted for the word "consideration."

Mr. GARFIELD. I concur in that idea, and if there is no objection I will change the language of the rule by substituting the word "discussion."

There was no objection, and the change was made.

Mr. COX, of New York. In regard to this amendment of Rule 112, I desire to make a remark rather in answer to what fell from the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.] I think the gentleman from Texas misapprehends the utility of the Committee of the Whole. I think his idea would break down all committees if carried to its full extent. I believe that Rule 112 as it now exists would require the House to consider any bill with amendments returned from the Senate, making appropriations of money, to have it considered in Committee of the Whole. All money bills should have their first consideration in Committee of the Whole, whether they come from the Senate or originate in the House. There is an object for this. It is an essential part of parliamentary law and custom. We find upon page 59 of our Constitution and Manual this expression, taken from an English writer on parliamentary law:

> The sense of the whole is better taken in committee, because in all committees every one speaks as often as he pleases.

I know that we are limited to five minutes' debate in Committee of the Whole; but we have the most valuable debates in Committee of the Whole. We cannot be cut off by the previous question. The philosophy of these rules is that they are intended to be impediments to legislation, obstacles to passing legislation; they are intended to stop bad or inconsiderate legislation. They were made, as I said once before in this House, by southern men, jealous of Federal power. They were made that there might be deliberation in our legislation in reference to the disposal of the people's money. I did not agree to the ruling of the Speaker as to the Senate appropriation bills, and I am glad that the Committee on Rules have given a proper construction to Rule 112, so that all bills disposing of the people's money shall have full discussion and deliberation.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, I thought when the gentleman from Ohio brought in this privileged report two weeks ago, and I have thought ever since I have been a member upon this floor that it was time that representation and not rules should govern in this House. Every new member knows that when propositions are made here the majority of this House are tied at every step by the rules of this House, agreed on before the House was fully organized. And now at the close of the session the gentleman from Ohio proposes to bring in a rule to fetter this House still further. What is the effect of our rules now? We all know very well that we pass a bill during the session and that we consume a long time in maturing the measure. We send it to the Senate. They have the same right to act upon it that we have. They act upon it, amend it, and return it to us near the close of the session. Under this proposed rule the will of a single man can send that bill to the Committee of the Whole, at the bottom of the Calendar, where it cannot be reached; and thereby the majority of this House is deprived of its right to legislate according to its will. That is what this rule proposes to do.

I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and to the Committee on Rules, I want to say it to the members upon this floor, that they cannot afford to stultify themselves and throw away the power which they ought to retain to enable them to legislate for their constituents. That power belongs to their constituents, and their Representatives in this Congress have no right to allow themselves to be tied up by certain rules of this House so as to defeat that will.

I am perfectly cognizant of the necessities of business here; I know that all rules must impose certain restrictions. But gentlemen knew very well that two committees of this House monopolize all power of legislation, the Committee of Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations. Those committees report a bill to this House, and the members of those committees have the power to move amendments proposing new legislation. But if any other member of this House moves such an amendment it is ruled out of order.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. The Committee on the Judiciary gets in occasionally.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Sometimes, not often. But it is in order for the members of the two committees I have named to propose new legislation, while other members, with equal constituencies and with equal rights upon this floor, are ruled down, so that all legislation is practically confined to a dozen or fifteen members on this floor. And it is the design of this proposed amendment to the rules to increase the power of those two committees—fetter the members of this House so that they cannot have a voice in proposing new legislation.

It is a fact not to be disguised that certain interests and certain localities wish to stop the action of this Congress and cripple the majority on this floor, finding that they can no longer control it. This House is denounced and told to go home by those who wish to defeat its legislation. Our constituents continually ask why we do not call up certain bills and have them acted on. The rules of the House as they now exist prevent it. We have to wait until the committees in their order are called, sometimes for months, and then, on a point of order that it involves an appropriation, a single objection carries it to the Calendar where it must wait its turn. That is bad enough, but this proposed rule or rules would be still worse.

I do not know what particular bill this proposed amendment may be aimed at. But I do know that if adopted, it would give the power to any one man in this House to defeat several bills which a large majority of this House desire to pass. I know that if this House shall agree to this amendment it will regret it. I ask the House to adopt no new rules at this stage of the session. I hope the House will vote down this amendment. I hope that no member upon this floor will consent to throw away and sacrifice a single power belonging to him as a Representative of the people on this floor.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PHILLIPS] has expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.]

Mr. MILLS. I ask the Clerk to read the closing paragraph of Cushing's Parliamentary Law.

The CLERK read as follows:

> In concluding the foregoing work on parliamentary law and practice, the author may be allowed to suggest that the great purpose of all the rules and forms by which the business of a legislative assembly is conducted, whether constitutional, legal, or parliamentary in their origin, is to subserve the will of the assembly rather than to restrain it; to facilitate and not to obstruct the expression of its deliberate sense.

Mr. MILLS. The sum total in the conclusion of that great work is—and the author states that he has been trying to impress it upon all who study the law of parliamentary practice—to ascertain and crystallize the sense of the assembly into law; it is that the will of the majority, the fundamental principle of all democracy and civilization, may be made the governing principle.

But the rules of this House proceed exactly on the opposite theory; that is, that you should obstruct legislation; that you should throw around it defenses, so that half a dozen gentlemen who may object to any measure may send it away off on a circuit where it cannot be reached until Congress adjourns. In that way they will be enabled to assume a sort of guardianship over the majority of this House.

Now, on this floor, each man is the peer of any other, and has the same right to his judgment and to have it weighed at its proper value as any other member of this body. But now we are told that there is danger when an appropriation bill comes from the Senate, that in the haste of legislation we will do something that ought not to be done. Who says that? Who is afraid that either branch of this Congress will do something that ought not to be done, that this House will concur in the action of the Senate without good reason? It is an argument that the majority of this body is not competent to be intrusted with legislation.

Mr. COX, of New York. By-laws and rules are made to restrain majorities.

Mr. MILLS. Cushing said all rules of parliamentary practice for the government of any deliberative assembly are made to facilitate the will of the majority—to facilitate and not to obstruct the public business.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will read what Cushing says when I get the floor.

Mr. MILLS. Some gentlemen want to kill the river and harbor bill; I understand that. This new rule is for a single purpose. A few gentlemen got mad because the river and harbor bill was passed by a two-third majority of this House, and they want to hedge it about and kill it by strategy. Twenty-five or thirty or forty members of this House say of the river and harbor bill that it is a poor business, will do them harm in their political campaigns, that it is a bad precedent. Therefore they propose to assume the authority of guardianship over four-fifths of the members of this House, and when the bill comes back from the Senate they want the power to send it to the Committee of the Whole at the foot of the Calendar, to put it in a well, in a sink-hole, and bury it so that it can never be reached. All this is done to defeat the expression of the will of the majority of this House, which is the supreme will of the land.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would ask the gentleman how this amendment of the rules can affect the river and harbor bill?

Mr. MILLS. The river and harbor bill is now in the Senate. It will be amended and returned to this House with Senate amendments. Under this proposed amendment of the rules it will be referred to the Committee of the Whole and placed at the foot of the Calendar, where it cannot be reached.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] for five minutes.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to call the attention of members of this House to the peculiar manner in which just at the close of the session it is proposed materially and almost completely to change the rules of this House, which have been sufficient for its government from 1794 to the present time. And these proposed changes of the rules are introduced by a little amendment here, unobjectionable in itself; a sort of calico-colored pony to lead in the circus. [Laughter.] It it proposed to amend Rule 112 by inserting after the word "made," in line 4, the words "or releasing alleged indebtedness to the Government."

There is no objection to that; it is an innocent little amendment, which can do no harm, and probable will never do any good; for substantially the same thing is already contained in other rules.

But, sir, what are these other two changes? One is that any bill originating in the Senate and making any appropriation of money or lands shall, when it comes to this House, go to the Committee of the Whole——

Mr. CARLISLE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman must not interrupt me in my five minutes; I asked the gentleman from Ohio [Mr GARFIELD] for ten minutes, but he declined to give me more than five; and these I must occupy myself.

Under the provision to which I have just referred, every bill from the Senate granting a pension, or making any appropriation of money or land, must in this House go first to the Committee of the Whole. This was the effect of the proposition as first reported; but gentlemen see that this is wrong, and now they propose to change the language of this carefully considered report of the Committee on Rules so that it shall mean an entirely different thing from the original proposition. But sir, I say that the adoption of this rule will send every pension bill of the Senate, not to the Pension Committee of this House, every claim from the Senate not to the Claims Committee of this House, but to the Committee of the Whole, and will put it within the power of any one member or any two or three members to send any bills of this character to the foot of the public Calendar.

Now this proposition is not made without an object. The Speaker has ruled upon this point, and he does not feel willing to change his ruling unless the rules are changed. Sir, I know why this rule is to be changed. The river and harbor bill passed this House and has gone to the Senate. There are amendments proposed by the committee in the Senate, which are or are not germane to that particular bill, and when the bill comes back here, if this rule now proposed be adopted, it will be within the power of one or a dozen of the little dissatisfied minority in this House to send that bill to the foot of the Calendar on a point of order and thus kill it.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] says that on any Monday, or at any time within the last six days of the session, we can reach the river and harbor bill under a suspension of the rules, and pass it. Does not the gentleman know that the Speaker, according to the rule adopted by him, will follow his list in giving the floor to gentlemen desiring to move a suspension of the rules? It was by the merest possible chance, a sort of providential interference, that a gentleman in favor of that bill happened to be first on the Speaker's list, and yielded his right to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. REAGAN] to report and have passed, under a suspension of the rules, the river and harbor bill. But for the fact that my colleague, [Mr. HURBELL,] himself a member of the Committee on Commerce, was first on the list, the river and harbor bill could not have been brought before the House during this whole session till the last six days of the session.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman from Ohio for five minutes more.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

Mr. CONGER. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will give me at least two minutes more.

Mr. BANKS. I trust that the gentleman from Ohio will not be too stringent. The House may give us, if he does not, sufficient time to discuss this question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, I give the gentleman from Michigan two minutes more.

Mr. CONGER. Now, sir, I desire the river and harbor bill to pass and become a law. With some amendments it would suit me better, it would probably suit many gentlemen here better, it would probably suit the country better. But the absolute necessity of improving the great water courses of the United States, of establishing means of communication that shall compete with the great railroad monopolies of this country, is a question that comes home to every farmer and every business man in the land. The Representative here who is unfaithful to his trust and allows monopolies to gain absolute control of the means of communication, when God has given us the rivers and lakes, needing but little improvement to fit them as means of transportation, must answer to his constituents.

But, sir, there is another proposition lying hidden in this meal—a proposition more dangerous than the other. I refer to the second and last proposition, by which the committee having charge of revenue bills may introduce as a privileged question any bill or resolution at any time in this House, and force it upon the consideration of the House.

I know why the gentleman from New York has been laboring to have this amendment offered here. It will save him a world of anxiety—a world of care.

These are the reasons that make it necessary in the last days of this session to lay violent hands upon the rules of this House and distort them for the purpose of defeating this legislation in this House, and for this session.

If other gentlemen desire to be defeated in their own will by the voice of one or two, or twenty members of the House, on points of order, I have no special objection. I can endure it with the rest; but I would prefer that this House should be able to do its own business in its own way, and not be trammeled by rules which shall give to one or two or a dozen men the entire management of all our business, and compel us to go back to our constituents who have been expecting legislation upon particular subjects, and confess to them that we ourselves have adopted rules which tie up our hands and shackle us in our efforts to do what our constituents require.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York spoke of the "intentions" of this proposition. Sir, "intentions" are not legislation, however wise and good they may be. They are sometimes used for pavements, [laughter,] but they do not carry conviction or weight as legislation. The objection to this proposed amendment to Rule 112 is that it violates the comity that must necessarily exist between the House and the Senate. I ask the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to this point. It is impossible for this House to establish for the legislation of the Senate a rule different from the rules of the House applicable to its own measures. If the House should do this the Senate may do the same thing, and there will be a break between the two Houses which may interrupt legislation altogether.

This amendment of Rule 112 does that. It says that "all amendments made to House bills not germane to the subject-matter contained therein as originally passed by the House shall, in like manner, have their first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union or the Committee of the Whole House." That does not apply to amendments made by the House to its own bills or Senate bills; but it includes all amendments made by the Senate to House bills which the House thinks are not germane to the subject-matter of the bill or resolution sent from the House to the Senate, and they must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the objection of any member or the ruling of the Speaker. It will defeat nine out of every ten bills coming from the Senate with such amendments. We therefore defeat the bills agreed to by the House, that may come back under such circumstances, unless by a suspension of the rules or other devious and uncertain paths we can get at them in the Committee of the Whole. We may be willing to accept amendments proposed by the Senate, but upon the objection of a member or the ruling of the Chair we must send the bills to the Committee of the Whole, where they never can be reached and disposed of at so late a period of the session as this.

The gentleman from Illinois says we can suspend the rules the last six days of the session. That can only be done by a two-third vote. But we cannot go to the Committee of the Whole for business the last six days of the session. There may not be any last six days of the session; for it only applies when the day of final adjournment has been fixed.

But that is not the objection I make to it. It violates the comity with the Senate in establishing a rule in reference to the consideration of its measures which we do not apply to business of our own. The right of the Senate to amend a bill sent from the House is a right conferred by the Constitution. Who limits the Senate to what the House may consider germane amendments? Who knows what a germane amendment is? It depends on the caprice, interest, or opinion of members who are competent to decide as to relevancy of their own amendments, but not those of the Senate. We have no right to apply such a rule as that, and if the House should agree to it unanimously it would be obliged soon to repeal it, because it would in the end affect unpleasantly the official relations between the two Houses.

There is another matter more fatal to wise legislation, about which the gentleman from New York spoke and which was alluded to by my friend from Michigan. I refer to that amendment of Rule 151, so as to enable all bills touching the revenue or public debt or other matters to be reported by the committee having charge of them at any time. Then an amendment is proposed to Rule 115, so that any "bill or resolutions touching the revenue or public debt at any time and other bills" shall be made equivalent to a special order and take precedence of every other business before the House, except appropriation bills. I wish to know whether the House is willing to adopt such an amendment. It will make, in the first place, any bill touching revenues or the public debt so far privileged that it may be reported at any time, and then by another amendment to Rule 119 put all bills "touching the revenue or the public debt" upon the same level of precedence and privilege given to appropriation bills.

What is it for? Yes, sir; what is it for? The gentleman from Ohio has stated no reason for it. Why is it? It is not my privilege to give reasons for it, but I can properly state to the House what it will do. It will make a privileged question equivalent to a special order of bills affecting the tobacco tax, the whisky tax, the income tax, the tea and coffee tax, and the suspension or abolition of the sinking fund. And it may defeat the river and harbor bill. Is any such result desired or intended by the House?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I will now yield for two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Speaker, as a matter of course I cannot discuss these amendments to the rule in two minutes. I wish to say, however, that I do not understand the object of the proposed amendment to Rule 112 is to prevent legislation; but that, on the contrary, the object is to prevent any appropriation being made out of the Treasury of the United States without at least some consideration. Unless we have a rule like this appropriations may be made without an opportunity of any member on the floor knowing anything about them, excepting the members of the immediate committee having it in charge. Long experience has established the wisdom of Rule 112 in reference to bills originating in the House of Representatives. Why should it not be extended to appropriations made by the Senate as well as to appropriations made by the House? It is as important that appropriation bills coming from the Senate to the House should be considered before being passed by the House, as that the House should fairly consider and discuss appropriation bills originating here. And that is all there is of the amendment. It can have no possible effect on the river and harbor bill. The Senate may appropriate $10,000,000 more on the river and harbor bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and the amendments will not be subject to the point of order for the reason they are additional appropriations which will be germane to that bill. I apprehend no man on this floor would have the temerity to make the point of order on the appropriation for the Kiskiminetas River up in Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman from Illinois want to know anything about the Kiskiminetas River? [Laughter.] If he does, I can tell him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield now to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to call the attention of the House to the quotation in our own book, which is a sufficient answer to the gentleman from Texas, if I can have his ear for a moment.

Mr. MILLS. Here I am, always before you. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. He quoted the last sentence in Cushing, a dim, nebulous summing up of things having no special meaning, no special application to a Federal Congress of limited powers under the Constitution making rules for its own observance. Now I want to call the attention of my friend from Texas to what Mr. Onslow said in relation to the rights of the majority and the minority of a parliamentary body:

> It was a maxim he had often heard, when he was a young man, from old and experienced members, that nothing tended more to throw power into the hands of administration and those who acted with the majority of the House of Commons than a neglect of or a departure from the rules of proceeding; that these forms, as instituted by our ancestors, operated as a check and control on the actions of the majority, and that they were, in many instances, a shelter and protection to the minority against the attempts of power.

A majority can always control. They have the power. Rules are not made to help a majority. Rules are made for the purpose of securing a fair and deliberate consideration to measures; and but for these rules the minority would be as powerless as a pigmy with a straw against a giant cased in adamant.

Mr. MILLS. Does the gentleman from New York mean to argue that the rules of the House are intended to give the control of legislation into the hands of the minority?

Mr. COX, of New York. Oh, that is sophistical, fallacious, and several other things I will not mention. [Laughter.] But one thing is certain, this amendment of the rules does not go to anything of the kind. It facilitates the operations of a fair majority. But it says: "You shall have certain steps, certain gradations in consideration, and among them is consideration in Committee of the Whole; and the Senate shall not originate money bills and bring them here to the House without our having a fair chance to fight them, if need be, or amend them in Committee of the Whole after full debate."

But the gentleman evokes the spirit of the river and harbor bill. This is intended, he says, for the purpose of defeating the river and harbor bill. For one, I never thought of the river and harbor bill in this connection until it was mentioned by the gentleman from Michigan.

A MEMBER. You are not on the Committee on Rules.

Mr. COX, of New York. It is not my fault that I am not on the Committee on Rules. [Laughter.] I have studied them for twenty years and I think I understand what they mean, their principle and their spirit; and one thing is sure, that if you break down these rules you will have a saturnalia of legislation not to be tolerated.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say but a few words and shall then ask for a vote. Gentlemen on both sides of the House have made two or three criticisms upon these proposed amendments of the rules. In the first place the gentleman from Michigan and some others think it is a suspicious circumstance that the Committee on Rules should come in at the close of the session and propose this change. If the House will indulge me for a moment I will explain why this comes in now or why it did not come in long ago. At the very beginning of this Congress the Committee on Rules were ordered to consider the whole of the rules with a view to reporting a codification and amendment of them; and among other things this amendment we are now discussing was called up very early—and for this reason: a curious case occurred that had to be ruled on under Rule 112. The language of that rule is:

> All proceedings touching appropriations of money and all bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first discussed in a Committee of the Whole House.

That is the rule now, the rule which was adopted in 1874 when we on this side of the House were in the majority. It was a rule adopted in the interest of economy. But in ruling upon that rule this kind of case came up: a proposition was made to release the sureties of a defaulting paymaster, and the question was whether that was an appropriation of money. The Speaker was compelled to rule that it was not in fact an appropriation of money out of the Treasury, although it prevented money coming into the Treasury by releasing the sureties. And the suggestion was made that the Committee on Rules ought so to enlarge the rules that they should apply to such a case as that. The first clause of our amendment, therefore, adds these words:

> Or releasing alleged indebtedness to the Government.

That is the first amendment we propose, that a proposition to release indebtedness of the Government shall be as much subject to be sent to the Committee of the Whole as a proposition to pay money out of the Treasury, which is already covered by the rule.

Now, we had intended to report this three months ago in connection with the whole body of the rules; but finding that we could not get through with the whole of the work the committee reported a part of what they had gone over. I say this to show we were not referring to anybody's bill. I do not think this has any reference to any bills pending in this House.

On the next part of the amendment the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] has made a point that I think is a just criticism. It was not the intention of the framers of this amendment to say that any amendment that was not germane should be sent to the Committee of the Whole, but only those amendments touching appropriations that were not germane; and I shall move as an amendment, to make it clearer, to insert after the words "amendments made to House bills" the words "touching such appropriations;" for that was the purpose of it.

Mr. CONGER. I submit that if it is necessary already to amend the amendments it would be well to let them go back to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will submit the amendment to the House.

Now, if any one thinks the committee had any sinister object in reporting these amendments, I think gentlemen will at least give me the credit of having had an opportunity to know it, and I desire to say that I know of no such object or purpose on the part of any member of the Committee on Rules. As to this rule, which is the only rule we are now discussing, I think every one can see plainly what its purpose is. It is simply to make effective the old rule that we passed in 1874. Now if gentlemen think this amendment ought not to pass at the end of the session when it might apply to some bills that are pending, let it go over, let it be recommitted. I think myself it ought to pass. I propose to vote for it; but I am not very strenuous about the matter, for I believe that the Speaker ought to rule upon the one hundred and twelfth rule just as we have fixed it here. I believe that the rule now is just what our amendment says it ought to be, but in order to test the sense of the House upon this question I will move the previous question upon the amendment proposed to the one hundred and twelfth rule only.

Mr. BANKS. I desire two minutes to say a word upon the first proposition, that which relates to the releasing of credits to the Government. Alleged indebtedness to the Government does not stand upon the same ground as a bill appropriating money out of the Treasury. Take this case for instance: here is a soldier who during the war was intrusted with the care of a horse. He comes here with one hundred witnesses to prove that the horse was killed in battle, and by this rule we say that his claim shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole, which means that it shall not be considered at all. How can the gentleman say that a case like that stands upon the same ground as a bill taking money out of the Treasury?

Mr. GARFIELD. I must move the previous question now.

Mr. CONGER. Pending that motion I move that this whole report be postponed until the next session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not now in order; but if the House does not sustain the previous question, then the motion will be in order.

Mr. CONGER. Then I will make a motion that will be in order. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is in order.

Mr. COX, of New York. Would that include all the amendments proposed by the Committee on Rules?

Mr. CONGER. I have moved to lay the whole report upon the table, and let them report their modifications of the rules at the next session.

Mr. COX, of New York. Was not the matter separated?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not see how a motion to lay a report on the table can be separated; the only relief that the House would have would be to refuse to lay the report on the table and then a separate vote could be taken upon the various amendments proposed.

Mr. COX, of New York. The Chair is right in that.

The question was put on Mr. CONGER'S motion; and on a division there were—ayes 146, noes 53.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 27 members voting therefor.

So the motion of Mr. CONGER was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAYES. I call for the regular order of business.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. SINGLETON. I rise to a question of privilege. I wish to make a report from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WADDELL. Has not the regular order been called for?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has, but the gentleman from Mississippi rises to make a privileged report.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on Printing, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 4292) to reduce the expense of the public printing and binding, and for other purposes, with amendments, and moved that the Committee on Printing be discharged from the further consideration thereof and that the same be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order of business being demanded, the regular order is the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill to regulate interstate commerce, &c.

METHOD OF ELECTING PRESIDENT AND VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. HERBERT. I desire to present the views of the minority of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws regulating the Counting of the Electoral Votes for President and Vice-President. It is the joint resolution (H. R. No. 183) proposing an amendment to the Constitution in relation to the election of President and Vice-President reported from that committee on yesterday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When the report was made yesterday leave was granted to the minority of the committee to submit their views, and the report now submitted by the gentleman from Alabama will be printed with the majority report.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move that the House resolve itself in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the Army appropriation bill, and pending that motion I move that all debate upon the pending amendment be limited to forty minutes.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I rise to a question of personal privilege as a member of this House. A charge has been made against the citizens of East and West Feliciana which affects my right to a seat upon this floor, and which, if true, would compel me, sir, with shame to retire from my seat here and return home.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the gentleman is stating no question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot decide that until he hears the statement of the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. This is simply an argument in an election contest.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair declines to recognize the gentleman from Indiana until the gentleman from Louisiana has made his statement.

Mr. ROBERTSON. There are charges made in a letter which I find published in the Washington Post addressed to Mr. CLARKSON N. POTTER, the chairman of the investigating committee into the alleged frauds in the presidential election, signed by John Sherman, and I ask the Clerk to read the passage which I have marked in that letter.

The Clerk commenced the reading.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would suggest that if the entire letter were read it would be more satisfactory.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I am perfectly willing that it shall be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana can have such portion of the letter read as he desires.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. We want to hear the whole letter read; it is good reading.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Only that portion will be read which the gentleman from Louisiana desires to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

I tender and offer to prove that, in point of fact, the election in East and West Feliciana Parishes was governed and controlled by force, violence, and intimidation so revolting as to excite the common indignation of all who became conversant with it, and proof was submitted to that effect not only before the returning board in evidence contained in Executive Document No. 2, second session Forty-fourth Congress, but also in the testimony taken by the Committee of the Senate on Privileges and Elections, Report No. 701, second session Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. ROBERTSON. What portion of the letter does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] desire to have read?

Mr. BURCHARD. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURCHARD. I submit that there is no question of personal privilege involved in what has been read at the Clerk's desk. No reference is there made to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] and he has no right to bring in here matters outside of what concerns his personal honor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has always been held a question of privilege of the highest degree for a member to respond to any charge that in any way affects his official character, or in any way affects his right to the seat he is occupying upon this floor.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The parishes referred to in the extract which I have read, West and East Feliciana, are in my district, and the people of those parishes I represent upon this floor. Had the writer of that letter been a private individual, however eminent he may have been, I would not have deemed it necessary——

Mr. BURCHARD. Do I understand the Chair to rule, on the point which I made, that there is a question of personal privilege involved in what has been read by the Clerk? I ask the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON] states that a reflection has been made upon his character as a member of this House, and upon his right to a seat here. And the Chair rules that that is a question of privilege. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Louisiana in regard to it, and does not see what else he can do.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The gentleman avers that the question of privilege arises out of the paragraph of the letter which has been read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has ruled upon the point.

Mr. BURCHARD. Mr. Speaker, [cries of "Order!" "Order!" on the democratic side,] then I desire to respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair and to say one word if the Chair will hear me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. BURCHARD. There are two hundred and ninety-two members in this House. Every one of those members has the same right which the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON] has to rise here to any question affecting anything relating to his district. Now, I submit to the Chair that the point which I make is that in the communication which has been read——

Mr. SOUTHARD. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] is in order.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Has the gentleman the right to debate a question of appeal?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is entirely within the discretion of the Chair, and the Chair desires to hear the gentleman.

Mr. BURCHARD. I shall be very brief. I desire distinctly to state my point. It is not because I have any objection to the gentleman's speaking, but it is to this interruption of our business.

I say that in the matter which has been presented by that gentleman there is no question affecting his personal honor, and therefore he has no right to bring it in here and intrude it upon the House and occupy the attention of the House in the discussion of this matter.

Mr. HALE. Will the Chair listen to me a moment on one point?

Mr. EDEN. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE. I do not propose to argue the question at all, only to present this consideration to the Chair. The whole subject-matter, involving this and many other things, after a long contest in the House has been referred to a select committee, which has been appointed. In the resolution authorizing the appointment of that select committee the Secretary of the Treasury was directly charged by name with an offense. He has brought nothing before this House. He has simply taken his personal stand in a letter addressed to the chairman of that select committee. In that letter he charges no member upon this floor with any dereliction of duty, with any departure from the line of his duty. He simply denies the charge against him; he affirms his own innocence, and asks for a hearing.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with your long experience upon this floor and your great knowledge of parliamentary law, it must be plain to you that if in the course of this investigation, committed by this House to a select committee, any gentleman who believes that he may be affected even remotely in any way by documents or letters or testimony which may appear, can therefore rise upon this floor and obstruct public business, and demand to be heard upon a question of personal privilege, then we may as well conclude that the rest of this session will go in a wash of general debate upon this subject-matter.

There is no disposition anywhere to interfere with any gentleman who under the rule is really affected by anything coming out of this matter. But if, Mr. Speaker, you depart from the rule which has always been absolute here, then the consequences which I have depicted must surely follow.

I trust that the gentleman himself will not urge here the beginning of what must surely result as I have stated. The gentleman who wrote the letter, an extract from which has been read, was mentioned by name in the resolution which authorized the appointment of the select committee. He did not bring the matter here into the House, let me repeat again. It is not here by any motion of his. The subject has gone to a select committee, where all the subject-matter has been committed by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not desire to hear any further argument. The Chair desires to make a statement of all that he has ruled upon this question. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON] rose, as he stated, to a question of personal privilege, and sent to the Clerk's desk to be read a statement by a prominent official of the United States, which statement declared that the election in two of the counties represented by the gentleman from Louisiana was carried by force, violation, and intimidation so revolting as to excite the common indignation of all who became conversant with it.

Now, the gentleman from Louisiana cannot claim that he rises to a question of personal privilege, unless he can connect himself personally with that statement, unless he can show reasonable ground that it is intended as a reflection upon him.

The gentleman now has the floor upon a question of privilege. This paragraph having been read, the Chair does not know in what way the gentleman may be connected with it. The Chair therefore gives him the same right that he would give to any gentleman, the right of statement. From this decision of the Chair the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] takes an appeal, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] moves to lay that appeal on the table.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to say—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER, pro tempore. The Chair does not desire to hear any further discussion on the point of order.

Mr. BURCHARD. I rise to make a proposition that is perfectly in order. [Cries of "Vote!"] Upon the statement of the Chair that he does not yet rule that the gentleman's statement is in order but is waiting for the gentleman to connect himself with the paragraph which has been read, I withdraw the appeal. But the statement of the gentleman so far is not in order.

The SPEAKER, pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana will now proceed with his statement, confining himself to the line indicated by the Chair. A mere general statement reflecting upon the character of the election in the gentleman's district does not, of course, involve any question of privilege.

Mr. YEATES, I state from recollection that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] was accorded a whole day here upon what was claimed to be a personal explanation when his name had not been mentioned in the matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That does not affect the present question. The gentleman from Louisiana will proceed.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I state, Mr. Speaker, that I am connected personally as a member of this House with the charge made by the writer of that letter. It involves a wholesale, sweeping charge against the people of the parishes of East and West Feliciana, without distinction of party, without distinction of race, color, sex, age, or previous condition of servitude. [Laughter.] It charges every man, woman, and child, republican and democrat, in the parishes of East and West Feliciana with having governed and controlled the election by force and violence and intimidation to such an extent as to excite the indignation of all men conversant with the facts.

I am intimately connected with this question personally as a member on this floor because a part of the people of East and West Feliciana voted for me; and I hold my seat here by virtue, in part, of the vote which they cast at that election. Therefore I submit that this is a question of privilege, because if the statement there made is true, then I have no right to sit here. I am therefore entitled to speak upon this as a question of privilege, not only for the purpose of denying the charge, but of branding it as a vile calumny.

I am prepared to show that in the parish of East Feliciana, as alleged in the charges contained in the resolution, a conspiracy existed by which the republican vote of that parish was not to be cast on the day of the election, with a view to throw out that parish before the returning board. I charge that this conspiracy was carried out. I charge that the supervisor of that parish—a stranger to our people, a man whom they had never known before—came there to register the voters. He came there also for a purpose which is fully developed in some testimony which I hold in my hand, and which I wish to have read.

A MEMBER. All of it?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I propose to have a portion of it read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the gentleman is going entirely beyond any question of personal privilege. The facts as to the election in those parishes are not matters to be discussed in this form.

Mr. BURCHARD. But it is in order for the gentleman to connect himself if he can with these frauds. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. Yes, sir; I do connect myself with these frauds by denouncing them. In that way I am connected with them. I say that the republicans of East Feliciana did not go to the polls. In this respect they were simply following out the same policy pursued recently on the other side of the House, when members for five days absented themselves upon every vote, (although answering to the roll-call,) and filibustered in order to prevent an investigation here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must rule that this matter cannot proceed further.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Well, sir, I know there was a conspiracy, and I believe that John Sherman was connected with it. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the regular order is the unfinished business, the bill to regulate interstate commerce. But the gentleman from New York moves to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Pending that motion, I move that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the pending paragraph of the bill be limited to forty minutes.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I would like to inquire what has become of the prior order, the interstate commerce bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the regular order; but pending that, as the Chair has stated, the gentleman from New York, in accordance with the rules, moves to suspend the orders, which may be done by a majority vote, for the purpose which he indicates.

The motion of Mr. HEWITT, of New York, to limit debate was agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, there were—ayes 137, noes 43.

Mr. WADDELL. I demand the yeas and nays. I want to see whether the House will have a morning hour or not.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I hope the gentleman from New York will consent to let us have a morning hour.

The House divided; and there were ayes 34, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not a sufficient number have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays. I hope the gentleman from New York will consent to give us a morning hour to-day.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I was quite willing to consent, or rather the Committee on Appropriations were, to have a morning hour this morning, but the time has been taken up with other business and it is important to get this appropriation bill to a close. I think it will be better to defer the morning hour, therefore, until the pending bill is disposed of, which I think can be done in one day.

Mr. FRANKLIN. We have had but three or four morning hours for the last month, and there are a great many committees who have bills to report.

Several members demanded the regular order.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WADDELL, and Mr. HEWITT of New York, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 31.

So (one-fifth not having voted in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate on the pending paragraph has been limited to forty minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, as showing a reason why the Army should be increased from twenty to twenty-five thousand enlisted men, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] yesterday sent to the Clerk's desk to be read a telegram from Governor Williams, of Indiana, asking assistance from the President of the United States. When that telegram was read it created on the other side of the House considerable merriment. That side of the House is composed largely this year of new men. They were unacquainted with the character of "old Blue Jeans." They did not know he was a man of economy. They were forgetful, or never heard, that last year he refused to give to the gentlemen the right to drink lemonade at the expense of the United States. [Laughter.] They forgot, sir, on all subjects he was an economist; one who had risen from the plow to the governorship of Indiana, as one of the great men of my State rose from a rail-splitter to be President of the United States. Mr. Williams has been, for a number of years, seeing at Indianapolis a lot of blue-coated men, and he had never thoroughly comprehended for what purpose they were there. He at once discovered he might utilize them; the Government was paying for them, and as a matter of economy he simply asked they might hand out the arms from the arsenal to the police and militia which he as governor was calling out. There was only a small squad of soldiers at Indianapolis in charge of the arsenal. He wished the arms to arm the militia with. He had men enough to call out, but had no arms. He did not ask for soldiers; he asked simply for assistance to get arms, for the arms that were there.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me contrast that telegram of Governor Williams with the action of a republican governor in the State of Florida in November, 1876. I happened to be a member of a special committee directed by this House in the Forty-fourth Congress to inquire into the use of the United States troops in connection with the election in Florida and South Carolina. Governor Stearns appeared before us. Let me read the testimony:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 16, 1877.

M. S. STEARNS sworn and examined.

By Mr. HARRISON:

Question. State your residence and official position.

Answer. I reside in Quincy, Florida. I was governor of the State of Florida for the last three years until the 2d of January last.

Q. Were you in Florida during the months of August, September, October, November, and December last?

A. I was, sir.

Q. Do you know whether there were any United States troops stationed in Florida during any of those months?

A. Yes, sir; there were.

Q. Regularly stationed there?

A. Yes, sir; there were troops regularly stationed in Florida at several points. At Pensacola, Saint Augustine, and at the fortifications at Key West.

Q. Were United States troops stationed anywhere else in Florida than at those regular points which you have just named, permanently or temporarily?

A. There were detachments at several points in the State in the month of November.

Q. What do you mean by detachments; detachments from the troops regularly stationed at the polls?

A. Yes, sir. These bodies of troops were scattered somewhat over the State from these places during the month of November.

Q. Were there any troops stationed there during those months not from those regular permanent forts?

A. Yes, sir. About the 12th or 13th of November two hundred United States soldiers arrived at Tallahassee, the capital of the State, from Atlanta, Georgia.

Q. Under whose command were these troops?

A. Under the command of General Ruger, I think.

Q. Are you aware of the circumstances that caused these troops to be sent there?

A. I am not aware unless it was the general political excitement at that time at Tallahassee and in the State.

Q. What was the nature of the general excitement?

A. About that time there were some demonstrations of violence in the State, such as the tearing up the track of a railroad, burning two or three bridges, and cutting the telegraph line. These were the outward demonstrations, with a good deal of public excitement.

Q. Were these acts done publicly?

A. No, sir; not publicly.

Q. Were they done by organized bands of men?

A. I cannot say.

Q. Have you any information that those demonstrations against the railroads and bridges were by organizations?

A. No, sir.

Q. Were they done at night or by day?

A. At night.

Q. Were they acts of such a character as would require a very large number of men, or might a few men have committed them?

A. I am unable to say, but it looked like a concert of action at that time.

Q. How many bridges were burned by one or two or three men, or would it amount to an insurrectionary act?

A. I am not able to say. I think it probable they might have been so done.

Q. How much of the railroad track was torn up?

A. I am unable to say, as I did not visit the place where the destruction occurred.

Q. As governor, you had of course authentic information as to the character of those acts. Was it that here and there a tie and a rail were torn, or was it long strips of road that were torn up?

A. No very long strips. The most damage was to these bridges, and they were not large bridges that were burned. In the other places a rail or two was taken up and the telegraph line cut, sometimes three or four poles cut down.

Q. A boy could cut a telegraph pole, I suppose?

A. I do not know.

Q. Were those acts of such a character as that you, as governor of the State or as the sheriff of the county, could not control them? Did you first try to control them through the civil officers of the law?

A. They came upon us so suddenly that there was no time to take any particular action.

Q. Then you did not attempt it?

A. No, sir, not specifically. Of course the officers were expected to protect property wherever they knew of its being threatened.

Q. Were the officers forcibly resisted anywhere?

A. No, sir; not that I am aware of. Those acts were done secretly and by night.

Q. Nobody was arrested for them?

A. Nobody was arrested for them that I am aware of.

Q. No person was attempted to be arrested for them?

A. Not that I am aware of, as the parties were unknown.

Q. The State of Florida during your administration has been an exceedingly quiet and peaceable State, has it not?

A. Yes, sir; generally.

Q. And has been exceedingly prosperous?

A. Quite so.

Q. Order has reigned generally throughout the State during your administration.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was there not, any time during the last several months, a time when any organization existed in Florida which you, as governor of the State, attempted to quell or put down, and were unable to do so?

A. I do not know that anything actually occurred which we were unable to manage.

Q. When those troops under General Ruger came to Tallahassee, by whose orders were they sent there?

A. By the orders of the Secretary of War, so far as I know.

Q. In answer to a request of yours as governor?

A. No, sir; I never made any formal requisition for troops.

Q. Did you or not send a dispatch about that time to Secretary Chandler in the city of New York?

A. I did.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. HARRISON.

Mr. HARRISON. I continue to read:

Q. Advising troops to be sent there?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where was Secretary Chandler when you sent that dispatch?

A. It was sent to New York City.

Q. Where was it directed to?

A. The Fifth Avenue Hotel, I think.

Q. Did you not direct it to the republican headquarters in New York City?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Had you received a dispatch from Secretary Chandler previous to that?

A. I had.

Q. What was the subject-matter of that dispatch?

A. I received a dispatch from Secretary Chandler in reference to the election.

Q. Have you a copy of it with you?

A. I have not.

Q. Do you know where it exists?

A. I think it likely that I may have it in Florida among my private papers.

Q. You cannot get it here?

A. No, sir.

Q. State as far as you can from recollection the substance of that dispatch.

A. There was nothing in regard to troops in the dispatch from Secretary Chandler.

(Mr. Kasson objected to the examination as not within the scope of the inquiry intrusted to the committee.)

Q. There was nothing in the dispatch from Secretary Chandler in reference to troops?

A. No, sir.

Q. Have you got a copy of your dispatch to him?

A. I have not.

Q. Where is it?

A. I do not know; I kept no copy.

Q. What was the substance of your dispatch?

A. A dispatch by way of information as to the condition of affairs at that time. Speaking of the indications of violence and that troops would be required to preserve the public peace, and stating a case of a train being wrecked the night before, a telegraph line being cut, &c.

Q. Do you mean that it was about a tie being broken which threw a train off?

A. Yes.

Q. Was that one of those cases which you referred to before?

A. It was one of the cases which I referred to before. There were only four persons reported to have been seen at the time.

Q. Did you apprehend that there would be an insurrection in the State of Florida which you could not quell?

A. There was danger of difficulty among the people, such was the excitement at that time.

Q. You had the power, I suppose, as governor, to call out the militia at any time to protect the public peace?

A. Yes, sir; but the militia was unorganized. We did not have a man under arms.

Q. When you felt that there was a danger of this sort, did you think that Secretary Chandler in New York was the proper person to apply to for troops? Was it the impression in Florida that he had the control of the troops?

A. No, sir; not at all. That dispatch was merely conveying information to him.

Q. Did you dispatch or write to the Secretary of War asking for troops?

A. I did not.

Q. Did you to the President of the United States?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you give them any information whatever as to the condition of affairs in Florida?

A. No, sir.

Q. But you did to Secretary Chandler in New York City at the republican headquarters?

A. Yes. As I happened to have occasion to telegraph him I gave him information as to the condition of affairs. I should have made application to the Secretary of War at that time for troops had I not received a dispatch from him that troops had been ordered to Florida sufficient to preserve the public peace.

Q. Had you not received from any person in Washington any information prior to that, that if troops were needed in Florida they would be sent there?

A. No, sir; not any intimation at all.

Q. Those two hundred troops were sent?

A. Yes.

Q. Where were they stationed while in Florida?

A. They were stationed on the edge of the city of Tallahassee in an open park there.

Q. Was there no intimation to you that you were able to protect the State yourself?

A. No, sir; I recollect nothing of the sort.

Q. Did those gentlemen who suggested the sending for troops prior to the election come to you after the election with any suggestion?

A. No, sir; they did not—not on that subject at all.

Q. Was there at any time before or after the election such a condition of affairs there that you felt you could not as governor of that State protect the State from any threatened violence or insurrection?

A. There were times when I apprehended very serious consequences.

Q. That is, you apprehended that you might be compelled to call out the militia?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. But was there a time that you felt that with that militia you could not have quelled any disturbance?

A. There was no time that I was not willing to rely on my own resources.

Q. And you gave no information to any of the Federal authorities at Washington that there would be such a condition of affairs as you would be unable to quell?

A. I did not.

By Mr. ——

Q. Was there any act of violence in Tallahassee or in that country from the date of election up to the inauguration of Governor Drew?

A. No, sir; I do not know that there was.

Q. Was there any act of violence on the day of the inauguration of Governor Drew?

A. No, sir; not any at all.

Q. How many white voters are there in the county of Leon?

A. About eight hundred.

Q. How many colored voters?

A. Something over three thousand.

By Mr. HARRISON:

Q. Then there are four times as many republican voters in that county as there are democrats?

A. Yes, sir; I think there are.
Q. You have spoken of some two hundred troops being sent to Tallahassee after the election; on what day did these troops arrive?
A. They arrived about the 12th of November.
Q. Were these the troops that General Ruger brought there from South Carolina?
A. Yes, sir; from South Carolina or Georgia.
Q. Do you mean to say that these two hundred men comprehended all the United States troops that were sent there?
A. All that I am aware of.
Q. Were you aware that there were thirteen companies transferred there at that time by General Ruger?
A. No, sir; I was informed that there were about two hundred men.
Q. You have no particular knowledge about the number?
A. No, sir.
Q. There was no military post at Tallahassee—no barracks?
A. No, sir.

Now, Mr. Chairman, Governor Stearns says Florida was peaceful. There were no disturbances and had been none; no disturbances which could possibly be considered of an insurrectionary character. Two or three bridges had been burned at night. He admits they might have been burned by one, two, or three men; no one was seen. A few rails had been torn up, a few ties removed, but in no place more than one or two. A few telegraph-poles had been cut; at one place three or four men had been seen running away. Tallahassee was quiet and peaceable; there had been no sort of disturbance there, and yet on his advice to Secretary Chandler, chairman of the republican committee, by telegram sent to republican headquarters at New York, for he had no correspondence with the President or Secretary of War, the Secretary of War under the order of the President sent a large number of troops to Tallahassee, Florida. Sir, why were they sent there? Ah, sir, the Army has strange uses in this free Republic. They wish it now to shoot down hungry men next summer. In November, 1876, they were sent to Tallahassee to see that the votes were properly counted. General Grant wished a fair count. The republicans in the county in which is Tallahassee are as 4 to 1 to the democrats; yet it required an army to see that this inestimable right of free Americans should be preserved. And they did preserve it. They protected the returning boards in their chaste performances, and Florida was cheated out of its votes; Drew was cheated out of his votes for governor. Afterward the courts decreed that Drew was governor and decreed that the Tilden electors were elected, but the great 8 to 7 commission in yonder room, dedicated to justice, refused to go behind the certificates, and the Americans have a President whom they never elected—a President counted in—counted in, and therefore a legal President, but not elected by the people. Sir, the people of this country will not soon forget this use of the Army. They are not willing to have an army either for the purpose of falsifying ballot-boxes or for shooting down American laboring-men.

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey. I desire to ask whether it is the opinion of gentlemen here that a republican form of government is a failure? It would seem to be so from some of the arguments which have been made use of here in this debate. The main argument which has been used in favor of maintaining a large standing army seems to be in consequence of communistic trouble. Now I desire to call the attention of gentlemen to this fact, which I think has not been brought to the attention of the House by any gentleman who has occupied the floor. Where did the communistic trouble arise? On the frontier? In the Territories? In sparsely settled districts? Did they not arise in States that are thickly populated? All the troubles we had during the last summer, all the riots which sprang up then only arose in States and districts which were thickly populated. And in every State where there was a governor equal to the exigency there was no need of calling the forces of the United States Government into requisition.

In the State of New Jersey we had a rebellion on a small scale, but by a proper exercise of the authority which he had the governor of the State called into requisition the troops of the State and suppressed the insurrection without the least loss of property or the shedding of the least drop of blood. If our State governments are capable of self-government, then there is no need of an increase of the Army for the purpose of putting down communistic trouble, if I am correct in the premises I have stated that communistic trouble only arises in locations where the people are thickly settled.

Do we need any forces during the time of peace except such as are necessary for the purposes of frontier defense? I have heard a good deal about the protection of the Rio Grande frontier, and I judge from the report of the committee and from what I have heard in the course of the debates in the House that the increase is unnecessary. Now, I find General Sherman says all the forces we need there would be four thousand men for the purpose of giving the required protection. How many have we there now? Four thousand. And what assurance have we, if we increase the Army to thirty thousand men, the General of the Army would send any more forces there than are there at this time? Therefore I ask what use there can be in increasing the Army for the purpose of frontier protection? None, unless there is a change in the head of affairs and a change in the opinion of those who have the management of Army matters.

I respectfully insist on these grounds it cannot be urged there is any need of any increase in the Army over what is fixed in the bill.

Mr. LAPHAM addressed the committee. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. HENDERSON. I renew the amendment. I am not, Mr. Chairman, in favor of reducing the effective force of our Army, and therefore I believe that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] ought to prevail. I give the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] great credit for a sincere desire to reduce the expenses of the Government without impairing the effective force of the Army, but I am wholly unable to reach the conclusion which he has arrived at, that this bill reduces the expenses of the Army without impairing its efficiency.

Mr. Chairman, we have an extensive country, and I believe from all that I have been able to learn it would be a very serious mistake for the Government of the United States to-day to reduce the force of our Army, which is needed not only for the protection of our frontiers from the Indians and our Texas border from Mexican raids, but for peace. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that an Army is needed, not for purposes of war simply, but for purposes of peace. I think an Army of twenty-five thousand men, with our extensive sea-coast; with all our fortifications, forts, arsenals, and military posts; with our extended frontiers; with the protection due to our citizens living on the border of Texas, is not too large. We need an Army as large as that to preserve, protect, and maintain all these national interests.

But what I particularly desire to say at this time, Mr. Chairman, is this: it seems that every time this question of the Army comes up for consideration in this House some gentleman thinks proper to rise here and talk about the military interference and the military domination which has prevailed in the South.

Now, I hope I should be the last man upon the floor of this House who would advocate the use of the Army for the purpose of maintaining a party and of carrying elections. I do not believe in that; but I would be glad to see some gentlemen on the other side of the House, who are always talking of military domination, at some time speak against the force and violence which have prevailed in portions of the South, as is well known, for it is a part of the history of the country.

I want full, free, fair elections everywhere, for every man and for every portion of our country; and I think it is no greater harm to have an Army, under the control and restraints of law, to preserve order than it is to permit military clubs or political organizations of armed men to intimidate and prevent the people from exercising the rights of American citizenship. I wish that some of our northern democrats and some too of our southern democrats would sometimes speak against this policy which has prevailed in certain portions of the South. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CAIN] spoke yesterday of seven hundred political clubs, composed of armed men, in the State of South Carolina during the political campaign of 1876. Is it not a well-known fact that that is true? When we had a mere handful of United States soldiers there to keep the peace, the country was excited with the idea that military domination was to prevail. Now, I have done nothing and said nothing since I have been a member on the floor of this House to excite sectional feeling. I want to see it allayed; I want to see peace prevail in every part of our country; I want to see the rights of citizens maintained and preserved. I do not believe that a handful of soldiers in Petersburgh, Virginia, or in Louisiana, in South Carolina, or in Mississippi, have been able to prevent the voters there from exercising their full rights; nor were they there for any such purpose. They were there for no other purpose than to prevent armed organizations and combinations of men from violence and from unlawful interference with citizens who desired to exercise the rights of citizenship and to speak and vote as they thought best.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] yesterday alluded to this matter, and every time the Army is discussed we hear this subject brought up. I wish we could hear something said against the formation of companies composed of armed men for political purposes who are not under the restraints of law. We have far more to fear from these than we have from an Army maintained by law and under its restraints.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, addressed the committee. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. ELLIS. As I understand it, the simple, plain proposition before the House is whether the Army shall be composed of twenty-five thousand men or whether it shall be fixed at twenty thousand, according to the provisions of this bill. In the brief space of five minutes it is impossible for me to do anything like justice to this subject.

I am opposed to the amendment increasing the number to twenty-five thousand because I can see no use for an Army of that size. Here let me refer to the speech made by the gentleman from Texas yesterday, [Mr. MILLS,] and to his urgent appeal, which must have touched the heart of every one who heard it, in behalf of an increase of the Army for the protection of his people on the Texas border. I would also refer to the appeals of gentlemen who represent States and Territories in the far West in favor of an increase of the Army for the protection of their people. No one shall go before me in sympathy for the unfortunate people who live upon our borders.

What are the facts? In the disposition of the troops made by the General of the Army or by the Secretary of War (I have his report here) we find that in the peaceful States of the North and South, excluding Texas and also excluding the exposed States on the far western frontier, there are to-day stationed six thousand men, idle, useless, and doing nothing. Now, I will go with my friend from Texas [Mr. MILLS] very far toward legislating these troops out of these States and on the western border.

Why, Mr. Chairman, are not ten thousand or fifteen thousand men sufficient for the protection of that border? There are already four thousand troops on the Mexican frontier and eleven thousand upon the western border. We might call into use for this purpose the six thousand idle men who are to-day doing mere garrison duty or, perchance, waiting for orders to invade the Southern States about September or October next; for I will tell you, very reliable information comes to me that some twenty districts in the South are already marked for the tread of the soldier at the next election. Let those troops be sent out upon the western border; and thus the demand of the gentleman from Texas for a reinforcement of our Army is amply and promptly met.

But I have heard that there is danger at home. I have heard that we need a national gendarmerie; that we need a national police of troops to suppress—what? To suppress "strikes," to suppress labor when it raises its arm and its hand against the exactions of capital. Now let me say, Mr. Chairman, with reverence for our institutions and with unfaltering faith in their success, that when the time comes that we have to employ a vast national police paid by the United States for the purpose of keeping this people down, our institutions will have proved themselves a failure, our Government will have become a farce, and the sooner we seek another form the better.

But will our present Army or anything like it suffice for such a purpose? What could even an army of one hundred thousand men do against the uprising of oppressed labor in this country? God forbid that such a day should ever come, for the laborers of this country are five or six millions of people. What could your Army of even one hundred thousand men do against them? Such an Army would be impotent to suppress any such insurrection.

But again, sir, by encouraging this leaning of the States upon a national police, what are we doing, unless we are destroying in the hearts and breasts of the States their consciousness of power to govern themselves? What are we doing unless we are weakening the States and qualifying them for submission to any exaction which the General Government may make? What are we doing, unless we are taking swift and hasty strides in the direction of that centralization which, alas, is the dream of too many of our statesmen?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BANKS. Will the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] inform us what twenty districts are "marked out for the tread of the soldier?"

Mr. ELLIS. There are three in Mississippi; there are two in South Carolina; there are two in Louisiana; and as to the others, I will furnish the gentleman information hereafter.

Mr. BANKS. Who has "marked them out," and where does the information come from?

Mr. ELLIS. It comes in a way which I will not tell the gentleman now; [cries of "Oh!" "Oh!"] but when the gentleman hears it, he will think an earthquake has broken loose upon his ears.

Mr. BANKS. That was what I wanted to know.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that to this important bill the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] who has reported it and who takes charge of it in this House, has devoted a great deal of care. Indeed, the bill itself shows that it has been carefully drawn; and, so far as concerns the organization of the Army, it is decidedly an improvement upon several bills that have come to us from the Committee on Military Affairs. Still, Mr. Chairman, I cannot agree with all the provisions embodied in this bill.

In the first place, I do not believe that this great country can afford to reduce its Army from twenty-five thousand to twenty thousand men. In my opinion, our Army should be increased to the number recommended by the General of the Army.

Again, I do not believe that the Army can be reduced to twenty thousand men without defeating the very organization which the gentleman from New York himself proposes. His proposition is to reduce the Army to twenty thousand men. The bill gives to each company of infantry seventy-three men, or five hundred and eighty-four to a regiment. Under the gentleman's plan of one hundred men to a company, the six cavalry regiments of twelve companies each would amount to seventy-two hundred men, making, with the eighty-seven hundred and sixty men belonging to the infantry, 15,960. Add to these thirty-five hundred as the non-effective force of the Army and we have a total of 19,460. But this leaves only five hundred and forty men to be divided among sixty companies of artillery, so that there would be but nine men in each battery. Unless, therefore, the gentleman continues the Army at its present force, twenty-five thousand, he will not have enough enlisted men to complete the organization which he has himself laid out.

Mr. Chairman, I need not repeat what has been already said, that within the last ten or fifteen years our Indian frontiers, which our Army is intended mainly to protect, has extended at least tenfold. As recently as 1863 we had a terrible Indian massacre on the borders of the Minnesota River. Then the Indian frontier receded. Since the completion of the Pacific and other western railroads every valley in the Rocky Mountains within the vicinity of an Indian reservation has become a frontier, and must be protected by your Army.

In addition to this, we see that on the borders of Canada there are manifestations of disorder, against which we must provide protection; for we have treaty stipulations with England that compel us, no matter what our individual feelings may be, to protect the Canadian frontier from invasion from our side. Unless we do this we shall have to pay a very large bill of claims. We also have trouble on our treacherous Mexican frontier, on which, as we all know, a serious war may at any moment break out, demanding very large re-enforcements for our Army.

I desire to refer also to the question of pay. By sections 7, 8, 9 and 10 it is proposed to reduce the Adjutant-General's department, the Inspector-General's department, and the Pay department, and subsequently to refer the question of their future organization to a board of major-generals.

The bill provides that the question as to these staff departments shall be referred to a board of three major-generals; but as to the Adjutant-General's and Inspector-General's departments, which are certainly as important as any in our staff departments, the Adjutant-General's department, embracing now seventeen officers, is reduced to five, and the Inspector-General's to three or four. The bill, after making these reductions and cutting off the major part of these two departments, proposes to refer the question to a board of three major-generals. It first destroys these departments and then asks a board of major-generals to report whether anything further should be done. I am opposed to this, and I shall at the proper time move to strike out those sections. I can state, so far as those two departments are concerned, they contain among them some of the ablest officers in the Army.

It is said the officers of the Adjutant-General's department have not seen any service in the line. There is not an officer in this department who has not seen service in the field. Most of them have seen service during the last war. I have not time to go over the whole list.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed for debate has expired.

Mr. DIBRELL. I wish to move an amendment, as a compromise between twenty and twenty-five thousand, to make the number twenty-three thousand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the condition of the question. The bill provides for twenty thousand enlisted men in the Army. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] moved to strike out "twenty thousand" and insert "twenty-five thousand." The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] moved to amend that amendment by making it fifteen thousand. That is as far as amendment can now be received, and the gentleman from Tennessee will have to withhold his amendment for the present.

The question first recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from New York to make the number of enlisted men fifteen thousand.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 112.

Mr. COX, of New York, demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. DIBRELL. I now move my amendment to make it twenty-three thousand.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] to make the number twenty-five thousand.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 106, noes 93.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HEWITT, of New York, and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 115, noes 107.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to announce, Mr. Chairman, that on this vote I am paired with my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. DURHAM, of Kentucky.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I give notice, Mr. Chairman, that I shall ask for a vote on this amendment in the House and shall demand the yeas and nays.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Before that is done I wish to move an amendment. I move to amend line 15 to make it correspond with the amendment just adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, it will be ordered accordingly.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move, in lines 16, 17, 18, 19, to strike out the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That not exceeding five hundred recruits in addition thereto may be kept at recruiting stations, as the necessities of the service may require.

Mr. CORLETT. Why is that necessary?

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If it is only necessary to have twenty-five thousand men, then it is not necessary to have twenty-five thousand five hundred.

Mr. MAGINNIS. As this question of reduction will have to be voted on——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Montana rise to discuss the question?

Mr. MAGINNIS. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto.

The amendment of Mr. HEWITT, of New York, was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses of the Adjutant-General's Department at the headquarters of military divisions and departments, $3,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to strike out all of the bill after line 24 and in lieu thereof to insert the following——

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read first, and then the Chair will decide the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the second section and insert the following:

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized and required, on or before the 1st day of July next, to constitute a board, to consist of the three major-generals of the Army, whose duty it shall be to examine into and report to the President, on or before the 1st day of December next, upon the organization, practical working, and efficiency of the various branches of the line and staff of the Army and to make such suggestions as in the judgment of said board will increase the usefulness or reduce the cost of the maintenance of the Army and of the several branches of the service, which report, when so made, shall be submitted to Congress by the President.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment because the committee have undertaken——

Mr. COX, of New York. I made the question of order against the amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. But I have commenced my speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserved the point of order to the amendment. The Chair had the amendment read first so that the point of order might be understood.

Mr. COX, of New York. I raise a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. The point of order had better be decided before I proceed with my remarks.

Mr. COX, of New York. I thought that the gentleman's amendment reached the whole bill after this clause.

Mr. FOSTER. It does.

Mr. COX, of New York. As I understand the amendment it is to strike out all of the bill after the clause which has been read.

Mr. FOSTER. It does; all after line 24.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not think that a proper amendment to strike out the whole bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Why not? It may not be proper, but it is in order.

Mr. COX, of New York. I think it is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is being considered by clauses, and the gentleman moves to strike out all after the clause which has been read.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Would it be in order to strike out all the appropriations contained in the bill and still call it an appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to strike out all after a given line.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the amendment bear upon its face a proposition for retrenchment?

The CHAIRMAN. That point has not been made.

Mr. COX, of New York. This is new legislation.

Mr. FOSTER. Why, it is one of the very sections of the bill reported by the committee, and it was reported with an especial view to economy. This is one of the sections of the bill itself, and I propose to substitute it and put it in place of the residue of the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I cannot tell anything about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I submit that, under the rules of the House, it is made the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to report a bill for the support of the Army, and it is now proposed to strike out every paragraph in the bill that makes any appropriation for the support of the Army, and it seems to me that that is in contravention of the rules of the House.

Mr. COX, of New York. If the gentleman from Ohio wishes to break down the Army he can do it in this way.

Mr. FOSTER. If my motion prevails, of course the bill will have to be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. EDEN. And have you votes enough to recommit it?

Mr. FOSTER. If we can adopt this amendment we can vote to recommit it.

Mr. COX, of New York. You are trying to break down the Army.

Mr. FOSTER. And you are trying to build it up, of course. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. My point of order is that pending the consideration of a paragraph of the bill it is not in order to move to strike out all of the bill after that paragraph; that the paragraph only is open to amendment.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. And this is new legislation.

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point of order that the gentleman's amendment would destroy the whole appropriation bill.

Mr. BURCHARD. That is no point of order. The House can destroy the appropriation bill if it chooses.

Mr. RYAN. Have not we a right to strike out the enacting clause of the bill or to lay the bill on the table?

Mr. COX, of New York. You cannot lay the bill on the table in committee.

Mr. RYAN. But have we not a right to strike out the enacting clause?

Mr. BURCHARD. A motion to strike out all after the paragraph is certainly in order.

Mr. ATKINS. A motion to strike out the enacting clause is usually made after the bill has been considered by clauses.

Mr. BURCHARD. Oh, not at all.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. We want to vote intelligently upon this question, and I want to know if I understand the purpose of the gentleman who offered this amendment, whether it be to recommit the bill to the committee with instructions. I understand that the Committee of the Whole must take some final action on the bill and I understand that the purpose of the gentleman from Ohio is to have final action by the committee on this bill, which will be done if they adopt his amendment, and then he will move that the committee rise and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Then, with that understanding, I am going to vote for this amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to say that a committee, in the consideration of a bill in the Committee of the Whole, has no different powers from any other committee of the House in the consideration of bills and has a right to consider bills precisely as other committees consider them. It can consider them in such a way as the committee pleases. We can move to strike out and insert a different bill, anything after the enacting clause at any time. The committee may be willing to agree to so much of the bill and not agree to the rest of it, and therefore at any moment, at any divisions of the lines of the bill, it seems to me that a motion is in order in a committee that the committee shall take what it has passed and strike out all the rest, or substitute something else for the rest, and it is the same bill still.

I am speaking now upon the question of order; whether it is wise to do it is another question. But the right of a committee to consider a bill in their own way is clear and indisputable.

The trouble about striking out the enacting clause is that it prevents any further consideration of the bill; it simply ends it. But this amendment of the gentleman does not do that. After we have inserted what he proposes, I can move to insert, if the House would sustain me, an entire appropriation for an Army of twenty-five thousand men or fifty thousand men or one thousand men, and if the committee agree to it the bill as amended will be reported to the House.

Mr. BANNING. I make the point of order that the proposed amendment changes existing law and does not reduce expenditures in any way whatever. I call the attention of the Chair to Rule 120, to the latter portion of the rule:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill [appropriation bill] or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order except such as being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, &c.

The subject-matter of this bill is appropriations. The proposed amendment cuts out all of the appropriations in the bill, and certainly cannot be in order and is new legislation.

Mr. BURCHARD. A motion to strike out and insert—that is, a motion to substitute—is certainly in order at any stage of the bill, so far as it relates to anything that is subsequent to that part of the bill. The question as to when such a proposition shall be voted upon is another thing.

The Chair will recollect that often at the commencement of the consideration of a bill a substitute is offered for it; but it may be necessary to go through with the original bill by sections or paragraphs before the vote is taken upon the substitute. But the motion for a substitute, the motion to strike out and insert, is certainly in order.

And this is the time for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] to make his motion. If he desires to move a substitute for anything in the bill or all of the bill after the point which we have now reached, now is the time for him to make that motion. If he shall wait until the committee shall have passed upon the remainder of the bill, he certainly will not have the right to move a substitute for any portion of the bill which has been adopted.

The question whether the Committee on Appropriations will insist that we shall go through with this bill paragraph by paragraph before the vote is taken upon the substitute, is another thing entirely. The question whether the motion can be made at this point, it seems to me, is one clearly within the practice of the House.

Now on the point of order, I desire to say that section 12 of this bill is substantially the same as the substitute moved by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER.]

Mr. EDEN. And that section is obnoxious to a point of order, and all points of order have been reserved on this bill.

Mr. BURCHARD. If that be so, then that section will be ruled out when we come to it.

Mr. COX, of New York. We propose to raise a point upon it.

Mr. BURCHARD. I will not discuss that now. I will discuss simply the question as to when the motion for a substitute should be made. I think the Chair will see that logically it should be made at this time. If the Committee of the Whole shall proceed to adopt this bill paragraph by paragraph, then when you come to the end of the bill it certainly will not be in order to move to strike out that which has been adopted.

Mr. COX, of New York. Does the gentleman mean to say that section 12 is germane to the bill?

Mr. BURCHARD. I have not examined that section particularly. I presume that the Committee on Appropriations is well advised of what would be in order under the rules.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman does not answer my question. It is whether section 12 of this bill as reported is in order. If not, then the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] is out of order.

Mr. BURCHARD. I did not listen to the gentleman's point which he made against this amendment. I understand him to say that it is not germane and I would like to hear him state why.

Mr. COX, of New York. You do not answer my question squarely.

Mr. BURCHARD. The affirmative rests upon you.

Mr. ATKINS. It is new legislation.

Mr. BURCHARD. Why is it not in order?

Mr. COX, of New York. Because it is not germane to the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. It certainly is germane and is in order.

Mr. ATKINS. I want it understood that I do not myself make the point of order, but the reason that it is not in order is that it is new legislation.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Were points of order reserved upon this bill when reported?

Mr. CLYMER. All points of order were reserved.

Mr. HALE. I myself reserved all points of order when the bill was reported, because the Committee on Appropriations has chosen to undertake to change the law by this bill. I take it that when the Committee on Appropriations choose to change the law in the direction of appropriations, the text of its bills is amendable in other directions. When the Committee on Appropriations brings in a change of law, it runs the risk that the Committee of the Whole may choose to change the law in an entirely contrary direction to which it proposes. Therefore the saving of all points of order saves the original law. Now while the Committee on Appropriations brings in clauses and sections in certain directions changing the law, I take it that the Committee of the Whole may take those sections and do what they please with them, as the Committee on Appropriations have opened the door for change.

I suppose what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] seeks to accomplish is this: there are two features in this bill. First, the reduction of the line of the Army, the rank and file. That point the Committee of the Whole has voted upon and voted to make the rank and file of the Army twenty-five thousand. So far that is settled.

The next important feature of the bill is found in the several succeeding sections to the appropriations which contain provisions changing the whole structure of the Army, providing for reducing the regiments and mustering out officers. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] proposes to meet that change by his amendment, providing for a commission to be appointed to report hereafter upon the subject.

We have settled the question as to the reduction of the Army so far as relates to the rank and file; and when we take a vote upon this amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] we will settle the question of razeeing the Army by reducing the regiments and mustering out officers, and for that proposition will be substituted a a commission. That being accomplished, then the gentleman from Ohio will move, when the bill is reported to the House, to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations, because these two votes will be instructive to that committee upon both of these subject-matters, the one keeping the rank and file of the Army at twenty-five thousand and the other having a commission instead of reducing the number of regiments and mustering out officers.

My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New York, would simply rearrange his figures upon that basis and re-report the bill. The vote upon this last proposition, which seems to me to be clearly in order, will test the sense of the House upon what is really the only remaining question, the reorganization as to regiments and officers.

Mr. GARFIELD. Besides that, it would be a great saving of time to settle the question now.

Mr. HALE. I take it that it would not be objectionable to my friend from New York, because it at once tests the sense of the House on the question.

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] asked me a few moments ago whether I considered section 12 in order. I had not then carefully looked at the section. I think, upon examination, that it is in order under the rule, because it proposes to appoint a commission of major-generals (which will cost nothing) to make suggestions as to the proper method of increasing the usefulness of the Army and reducing the cost of its maintenance. That being the object of such a commission it is in the interest of economy, and therefore the provision would, I think, be in order.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio and the discussion which has followed it especially upon the part of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] remind me very much of the proceedings in Committee of the Whole upon the Army bill which caused the call of the extra session of Congress by the present President. The gentleman from Ohio must, I think, perceive that if his motion should be carried, it will necessarily protract this session of Congress to an indefinite period in the summer. He proposes, first, that we shall delegate to a commission, to be appointed by the President, everything with reference to the administration of the Army, every proposition for reform in that branch of our service. He gives us notice in addition that if this shall be carried he will then move to recommit the bill to the same committee that reported it. Now, in the first place, Mr. Chairman, the Committee of the Whole has no power to recommit a bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FOSTER. Nobody claims that it has.

Mr. WOOD. It is only competent for the House to recommit a bill. If the Committee of the Whole should rise and make a report to the House in favor of recommitment, it would then be for the House to determine whether the bill should be recommitted or not. There is a limitation to the powers of the Committee of the Whole over this peculiar question.

Now, I submit to these gentlemen that all they propose to do with this important question as to the change of the administration of the Army is to refer it again to the same committee, of which they are both members; and they have no doubt as such exercised their influence fully and properly in reporting this measure to the House. The proposition is that this same committee shall again sit in judgment upon the question, and at some indefinite period—perhaps next month or the month after—report back this bill. In the interest of legislation, with a view to bringing to a conclusion all these appropriation bills at the earliest practicable period consistent with sound policy and that line of economy which it is incumbent upon this House to exercise in justice to the people of this country, more especially the tax-payers of the country, I hope we shall now determine this question, and let it be seen whether the Army shall ever be reformed—whether the present arrangement which has been the creation of the party in power shall be perpetually continued by means of evasion—by delegating to the President of the United States, acting no doubt under the direction of the General of the Army, the appointment of a commission to sit in judgment upon this whole question.

Mr. ATKINS. I call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to Rule 107:

> Upon bills committed to a Committee of the Whole House, the bill shall be first read throughout by the Clerk, and then again read and debated by clauses, leaving the preamble to be last considered; the body of the bill shall not be defaced or interlined; but all amendments, noting the page and line, shall be duly entered by the Clerk on a separate paper, as the same shall be agreed to by the committee, and so reported to the House. After report, the bill shall again be subject to be debated and amended by clauses, before a question to engross it be taken.

Now I submit that under this rule it is absolutely necessary to consider this bill clause by clause until we have gone through the entire bill. Then after the bill is reported to the House and before it is ordered to be engrossed, the question presented by this amendment may properly be raised. From the reading of the rule, I take it the amendment is entirely out of order now and cannot be offered as a substitute.

Mr. BURCHARD. No doubt after the bill is reported to the House it would be subject to amendment and debate by clauses, in accordance with the rule, if the previous question should not be sustained.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to suggest that this proposition instead of being an obstruction and a delay, is clearly in the interest of hastening legislation. This bill contains two provisions in the way of innovation: first and chief, the foundation of all, the proposition relating to the size of the Army. Then there follow probably one hundred clauses of appropriations. The amounts appropriated are distributed in those one hundred clauses. We now fall back upon the key-note of the bill, the size of the Army. The bill was all gauged for an Army of twenty thousand men. This Committee of the Whole has resolved to change that gauge and put it at twenty-five thousand. This necessitates the reconstruction of these one hundred items distributing the different appropriations. Now, everybody knows that this reconstruction cannot be done in the Committee of the Whole House. But in half a day—perhaps in two hours—the Committee on Appropriations can sit down and readjust these matters. The proposition of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER] is simply a means of getting at this by sending the bill back to the Committee on Appropriations to carry out the instructions which the Committee of the Whole have agreed upon. Let this be done. The Committee on Appropriations, after one sitting, can report back the bill with the necessary modifications properly made and properly adjusted, as they cannot be made and adjusted here in Committee of the Whole.

Therefore, rather than go through with all the items of the bill and leave them in a tangled and inharmonious shape, the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio is in the direct interest of hastening legislation and getting through sooner, and I hope it will prevail.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman from Ohio is under an entire misapprehension as to the effect of these amendments upon the several clauses of the bill. The amendment already adopted will require the alteration of but two clauses, and I am prepared to state to the committee the exact amount. It can be done in the ordinary reading of the bill, and therefore for that reason it is unnecessary to recommit the bill. But if the proposition of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] should be adopted, then unquestionably it would be necessary to recommit the bill, because that would affect the question of compensation of all officers who under the provisions of this bill would be retired. It is for that reason I make the point of order against the proposition. As to the other point it is clearly in order and will involve neither delay nor the necessity for recommitment.

Mr. REAGAN. Has the Chairman decided the question whether it is in order to strike out the whole bill, as indicated in the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. REAGAN. I only desire to say that in looking over the rules in relation to the discussion of a bill in the Committee of the Whole by paragraphs, I can see only reference to motions being in order to amend by striking out the pending clause or paragraph. There is frequent reference to striking out the clause under consideration, but not to striking out that clause and all succeeding clauses of a bill which have not yet come up for consideration. This bill being under consideration by clauses or paragraphs, I submit there is no authority under the rules to strike out all the succeeding paragraphs and sections. Instead of that being in order it is a direct perversion of the rule requiring the consideration of the bill by paragraphs in Committee of the Whole. If that can be done, it not only subverts the rule, but it defeats all rules under which we are required to consider this bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COX, of New York. Suppose this amendment is in order, it would be impossible to vote on it, under the rules, until we got through with the rest of the bill, clause by clause and paragraph by paragraph. It would have, therefore, to remain pending as a standing menace to the bill from beginning to end. It is an inartificial mode of legislation, it seems to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide the point of order. The amendment moved by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] is a modification of section 12 of the pending bill as reported from the Committee on Appropriations. All points of order have been reserved on this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. But the amendment strikes out all of the bill after the pending paragraph and proposes a substitute therefor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not referring to that point. The proposed amendment is a modification of section 12 of the bill, and points of order have been reserved on the entire bill. The question whether section 12 is germane or not has not been raised and cannot be until it is reached. To the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, which is a modification of that section, the point of order is raised that it is not germane at this point and besides does not, as required by Rule 120, retrench expenditures. This is entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes." The Chair submits if the amendment should be received and adopted the title of the bill would be to authorize the President to create a commission for the purpose of the organization of the Army, and therefore it would be an entirely different measure from that reported by the committee. On this test the Chair is of the opinion the amendment is not germane. On the other point the Chair will not express an opinion at this time. The amendment cannot be received.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Let the Clerk proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay department:

For pay of the commissioned and non-commissioned officers, privates, (including those employed as Indian scouts,) storekeepers, musicians, and veterinary surgeons, artificers, farriers, and saddlers, except as hereinafter enumerated, $3,390,000.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to add, after line 36, what I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any musician who shall leave his post to engage in musical performances for emolument or hire, other than engagements connected with his military service, and all musicians in the Government are hereby prohibited from making such engagements.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that is new legislation.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope my friend will withhold his point of order and let the amendment go through. I will strike out the last clause.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will reserve the point of order and the gentleman can go on and make his speech.

Mr. COX, of New York. The only object of the amendment is this: our musicians whom we pay have come into the cities and entered into competition with private musicians. We pay them and they cut down the compensation of those who have a business of their own as musicians. The amendment is right, and the committee agree to it.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 65, noes 71.

Mr. COX, of New York. I call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER.]

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the amendment may be again read. I do not think it is properly understood. I am told that the object of the amendment is to prevent musicians going on lecturing tours.

Mr. COX, of New York. May I be allowed to explain that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Only by unanimous consent, as the committee is dividing.

Mr. COX, of New York. There does not seem to be a quorum here, and if there be no quorum, I might as well talk.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from New York being again heard in explanation of his amendment?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX, of New York. The amendment has simply this for its object: men who are paid by the Government for doing a certain duty compete with other men in the same line of business. I propose to limit them to their duty. They have no right to leave their posts to compete with other musicians.

Mr. FOSTER. Will that increase the cost of music?

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman once had a serenade at Philadelphia, and ought to know how much music costs. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask one question? Would not this be a bad precedent for those of us who are receiving $5,000 a year for our services, and who might wish to go out in any other employment, as that of lecturers or anything of that sort?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. COX, of New York. If I could only have the musical voice of my friend from Michigan, I would be willing to abolish all the rest of the music in the Army.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 84.

Mr. COX, of New York. Has a quorum voted?

The CHAIRMAN. Just a quorum.

Mr. COX, of New York. I thought there was hardly more than a quorum present.

So the amendment of Mr. COX, of New York, was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read as follows:

Miscellaneous:

For the pay of contract surgeons, $180,000.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not differ with my most advanced friends on this side in regard to the uses of the Army. The States must do their own police work and keep their own peace. The Army is for the defense of the country against invasion, actual or possible, and for the defense of the citizen against savages waging war upon the settlers or upon each other in defiance of the authority of the Government within the territory of the Union. For this purpose the Government was established. When it fails to accomplish the protection of the citizen, it abdicates its principal function. The force requisite to guarantee peace and safety is the subject under discussion. The democratic party in this House is responsible for its proper decision. The leaders accustomed to methods of opposition sometimes forget that power has brought responsibility, and do not feel that their first aim is to protect the lives, liberties, and property of the people. Economy is a desirable thing, gentlemen, but your dollars are not to be weighed against the blood of your fellow-citizens; and the party that has the power must take the responsibility of preventing disaster. And let me tell you that any party that sacrifices the citizen, that fails to provide for his protection, that habitually antagonizes the patriotic sentiments of the people and habitually humiliates the national pride must go to the wall, though it could carry on the Government without expense and could fill the treasury without taxation.

The gentleman [Mr. HEWITT] who reported and so ably champions this bill, and who has given to its consideration a world of care, claims that by the tests of past experience and present use the Army is too large, whether judged by the increase of population or by the increase of military posts. These are theoretical data, the accuracy of which is modified by other elements omitted from his calculations. The increase of population has driven the wild tribes into smaller compass and presses them on many more irritating points. The destruction of game, especially buffalo, has left them destitute, and the uncertainty of their future drives them to desperation. The number of settlements in immediate contact is far greater, and the possibilities of collision are indefinitely multiplied.

If the gentleman would further analyze his figures in regard to military posts, I venture to say that he would see that the number of frontier posts has more than doubled, although on account of the fact that eastern posts have remained as before the total number of posts seems to justify his deductions.

But a change has also taken place in military policy. The greater concentration of the Indians and their increased effective force as fighters have done away with the usefulness of smaller garrisons. They are no longer so efficient, and both economy and efficiency require the establishment of larger posts. The true test of the present use of the Army on the frontier is the number of Indians in its immediate front and their fighting force as compared with the troops. Upon this subject I think I can give the House some information.

In the district of Montana we have the Flatheads, Kootenays, and Pend d'Oreilles, and the passing Indians from Idaho on the west; the Bannocks and Shoshones on the south; the Crows on the east; and on the north the Blackfeet, Bloods, Piegans, Gros Ventres, and Assinaboines, and over the border the refugee Sioux and Nez Percés. Two of these tribes are friendly, allies even; the rest are semi-hostile. All these tribes have representatives at agencies, and all are of that class described by the gentleman from Illinois as being fed, clothed, and christianized by the Indian Bureau. But of all this number there are not twenty that gain their livelihood by agriculture. They habitually roam off their reservations. They must do so or starve; and, armed and mounted, they annually pass through the settlements to the buffalo grounds on the northeastern frontier.

And right here let me call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] to the error he has made in defining the dangerous elements among the Indians. He reckons these treaty Indians as absolutely peaceful, as tribes from which no danger need be apprehended. But, sir, every Indian war in our history with one exception has been waged with this class of Indians. That one exception was the war with the hostile Sioux. And even then the great mass of the Indians in Custer's fight were from the agencies. Reported by the Department as peacefully on the reservations, our soldiers were thus misled as to the strength of the hostile camp, and thus deceived to their death.

The settler of to-day, Mr. Chairman, is not the frontiersman of the Leatherstocking stamp. The peaceful farmer who has taken his family from the western prairies, from the overcrowded cities, or perhaps from Scandinavia or Germany, (led to this country by promise of a home and protection from our Government,) has never in all his life handled a gun or had any use for one. Through these peaceful settlements these armed and mounted hunters ride with the freedom and impudence of the black bands and free lances roaming through Europe in feudal ages——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KIDDER obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. MAGINNIS.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Thanks for the courtesy. These Indians, exclusive of the Sioux over the border, can put into the field five thousand warriors well mounted, and I defy contradiction of that statement. I might appeal to the commander of the district of Montana, who now sits in the gallery, to support me in this assertion. Formerly these Indians warred among themselves, and we had no fear of hostile coalition against the whites. But all these difficulties have been reconciled by the peace policy of the Indian Bureau. Now, considering the contact of the hostile Sioux and Nez Percés, with their wily leaders endeavoring to form coalitions, and that the principal obstacle, their own antagonisms, has been removed, is it at all panicky in us to fear a repetition of the scenes which occurred under Tecumseh and the Prophet, and during the southern confederation and during the Black Hawk war, when we know that they might rise upon our settlements, and there is not a single soldier there between them and the Missouri River.

This district, containing some twenty-five thousand Indians according to the census of the department, is occupied by two small regiments of infantry and three companies of cavalry under General Gibbon. But between the annual rendezvous at the buffalo grounds and the settlements on the Missouri River, there is not a single soldier, neither is there on the river itself, although it is the artery of our commerce on which thirty to forty steamers constantly ply. Loaded with thousands of lives and millions of property, they are constantly subjected to attack and frequently are attacked. The land route for wagons and immigrants has been abandoned for years as unsafe. Upon this line there is not a single soldier. True, the authorities have asked and the military committees have recommended a new post, but the bill has not yet passed, and when the post is built it must be garrisoned.

Farther south and east is the line of the Yellowstone, from which the hostiles have just been driven. For fifteen years its valleys have been the scene of unremitting, unrelenting, never-ceasing war. But the clash of that distant conflict never even attracted the attention of this House until the day when the death of Custer and his troopers startled its lethargic ears. Men glibly prated then, as men glibly prate now, of general peace when we had general war. In vain my predecessors and myself plead for the establishment of posts upon that river. In vain the officers called for them and the military committees of this House and the other sent their bills to your desk. Under our rules one objection ended them; and a man was found who, strong in his own conceit and devoted to one idea, persistently made that objection. And it was not until the white robe of his goddess of economy was crimsoned by the blood of that massacre that he sat with dumb lips and let the bill go through without objection.

The death of Custer and his men was in itself an awful calamity, but it was the best thing that ever happened for our poor country. In that sacrifice was our salvation. Now protected by two posts, commanded by that energetic and gallant soldier, General Miles, the model of the volunteer officer, who graduated in the school of our civil war, the district of the Yellowstone, only disturbed by the specter of Sitting Bull's return, rests in comparative peace, and a thousand humble homes have risen upon the river banks within the year.

Our line of travel to the railway crosses another Indian reservation where the Shoshones have been all winter upon the point of rising—some twenty-five hundred, confronted only by one small company of infantry at Fort Hall.

But gentlemen say this is all the fault of management. Why do they not take the troops from some other place and put them where needed? Where will they take them from? From Idaho, whose fields are still smoking with the blood of the last outbreak of peaceable and civilized Indians? Three hundred and sixty soldiers present for duty on paper, under Wheaton, are scattered at different points, watching fifty-six hundred Indians in that Territory? From Wyoming, until last season raided to the streets of its railroad towns? Some of the posts there are to be broken up. That is the economy of a railroad. Will you obtain them from Dakota, the home of the great confederated tribe whose name it bears, with 50,911 Indians and twenty-three hundred and seventy-six troops? From Colorado, where this House recently asked why better provision was not made against a threatened uprising of the Utes?

Will you take them from the Indian Territory, where, besides policing some fifty thousand civilized Indians, seven hundred troops are guarding nineteen thousand wild Indians, but lately on the war-path, who were put on the reservation only last year, and who are ready to break out again as soon as you pass this bill to reduce the Army? General Davidson, in a letter to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. THROCKMORTON,] says that he can hardly restrain them now?

From Utah? There are but few there and all are needed.

Can you take them away from Texas, where you have been unable to maintain the frontier, established by the Spaniards, against the Indians? Or the border established by your treaty against the Mexicans? The Texan delegation can speak for themselves, and the frontier people may thank Heaven that they can vote as well as talk on this bill. From New Mexico, where, besides the Pueblos and Maricopas, there are fifteen thousand of the most warlike Indians on the continent, that have, off and on, fought the Spaniards for two hundred years, and fought your troops almost unceasingly since the conquest; quiet to-day, but where there has been one uprising since this Congress met and may be another before we adjourn? Is six hundred and forty-nine troops an extravagant number to watch those Indians and the Mexican border also?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CORLETT. If the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] will withdraw his amendment I will renew it and yield my time to him.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CORLETT. I renew the amendment and yield to the gentleman from Montana, [Mr. MAGINNIS.]

Mr. MAGINNIS. Will you obtain them from Arizona, where 20,848 Indians have ridden over that country for years, until its ranches were deserted, its mines abandoned, and, as its Delegate will testify, its citizens only traveled from town to town by night and in detachments? General Crook did put these Indians on their reservations; but I ask if there is any man in this House having the responsibility who would put less than one thousand and six men, the present force, in charge of those twenty thousand Indians and require that force at the same time to keep a watch on the border.

In California there are but a few small garrisons, in Nevada there are still less, and in Washington Territory 709 troops under General Sully stand guard over 13,722 Indians.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him now?

Mr. MAGINNIS. I would rather not. This is the disposition which has been made of your frontier forces. Is there any military genius among the warriors and statesmen in this House, some of whom have had as large schooling in war as the veteran soldiers of the first Napoleon, that can suggest a better disposition of these troops?

But gentlemen say come east of the Mississippi and you will find a vast reserve of troops. Mighty reserve! How many available for frontier service? No calvary. One regiment of infantry at Atlanta, and another at New Orleans, waiting to go west as soon as they can abandon the quarters they now occupy and find a shelter of huts at some new post on the border. What else have we? Artillery regiments to garrison and keep up the permanent seaboard and northern fortifications and to practice the science of gunnery—unfit for frontier purposes. Not one of these is mustered out by this bill. These are all east of the Mississippi; and, supposing there should be a few stations where regiments worn out and wearied by long frontier service might occasionally pass a pleasant year of duty in contact with the associations and refinements of the East, we should not grumble. There are many on this floor who have again and again been wasted in useless and indecisive battles, wearied in purposeless marches, worn out with the fatigues of an overworked soldier's existence, till martial ardor and patriotism paled their fires and only duty and discipline kept them in line. Is it for you, gentlemen, who know something of these things, to say that there shall be no pleasant posts to which our soldiers can exchange once in ten or fifteen years; that there shall be no holiday in the life of the American soldier?

But gentlemen around me say that we have a greater Army now than we had in 1860; and what need have we of more now? Sir, the lines of settlement have been vastly extended since 1860. Few of the Territories now organized had then been organized. There is hardly an Indian reservation on this continent that is not bordered by a white man's farm. But another thing unmentioned in this debate is after all the greater cause of difference in the conditions of savage warfare between now and 1860, that is the breech-loading rifle, the magazine gun. No longer can a company of your cavalry dash with the saber through an Indian village; no more can a company of infantry stand in volleying line against the lances and arrows and flint-lock fukes of thrice their number; no longer like a mailed Cortez cutting through naked swarms can one disciplined troop disperse whole tribes. The breech-loader has made the Indian's last fight an equal fight. He was born to the tactics which belong to it, he was reared in the skill to use it, and he owns the weapon which makes him the perfect warrior.

Sir, this new arm has revolutionized the conditions of warfare all over the world. Do you think it has not changed the situation on our plains and in our mountains. What has the late war between Russia and Turkey proven? What are Von Moltke, and MacMahon, and Chesney, and the leaders of military art in the Old World doing? Read their instructions for battle, the skirmishing, the grouping, the rushes. What is it all? They are planning their battles on the practices of the American frontier, and teaching the armies of Europe the tactics of the American savage.

And, gentlemen, go back for comparison to 1860. Why not go back to Clive or to Cortez? Did we have army enough in 1860? Why, sir, the American Army has from the first been called on again and again to march against overwhelming numbers and to meet disaster. Not from any fault of organization, but from simple want of forces.

Massacres have become so much a matter of course in our military history that we admire the continued devotion with which our soldiers march forth against overwhelming odds and threatened annihilation, still facing duty in this savage warfare, where disaster is death and victory brings no renown, their country not even calling the conflict war, and denying them the dignity which great battlefields give to their dead. Yet the pages of history are not illuminated by greater heroism or devotion; and when I recall the massacres of Florida and Oregon, of Fetterman and the Little Big Horn, I remember the legend upon the Alamo:

Thermopylæ had its messenger of defeat, but these had none.

[Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RYAN obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. MAGINNIS.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Thank you, sir.

These gentlemen defend their bill with much ingenuity on the ground that it does not reduce the fighting force of the Army. By the consolidation of the skeleton regiments and the abolition of details we are going to have a stronger Army than now. What a singular proposition, Mr. Chairman. In the same Army, under the same management, you are going to cut off seven hundred officers and five thousand men and have more soldiers for frontier service than before. Greater than Cæsar, or Frederick, or Napoleon is the military genius who can accomplish that feat. Greater than all combined is he who can do it as the bill proposes, barely touching the staff, and leaving the artillery, the engineers, the ordnance, and that weather prophet Signal Corps.

Who go out? Seven hundred officers from the frontier. Six hundred of these are young and efficient officers, every one of whom carries his rifle into action. How many new recruits under this bill and how many years' training would they require to make up in an Indian fight for the six hundred gentlemen you are going to muster out, nearly every one of whom is a trained hunter and expert rifleman.

Sir, officers and men all alike go into an Indian fight with rifles to their shoulders, and they fight it out together. And subaltern officers do not cost so very much more than enlisted men as you might think, everything considered. You have instanced the battle of the Big Hole Pass. Did the men do any less because they were led by a corps of officers, among whom were some of the crack shots of the Army, and all of whom used their rifles and fought with their men? No, sir; the difficulty was there were not enough of them, and now you propose to make them still less in number.

I favor Army reorganization; but as we have been told that this bill will benefit the frontier, let us see who goes out and where they are from. Who are to go out under this bill? Not the exuberant staff, not the regiments along the seaboard. Every regiment that goes out, except two, is a frontier regiment. The Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Infantry in Texas; the Twenty-third Infantry in Kansas; the Twenty-first Infantry (General Sully's) in Washington Territory; the Twentieth Infantry from Texas; the Nineteenth Infantry in Colorado; the Seventeenth Infantry at the Sioux agencies; the Sixteenth Infantry at Fort Sill and adjacent posts. Only two regiments east of the Mississippi are mustered out—the Eighteenth Infantry, part of which is at Atlanta, and the Twenty-second, which guards the line of the lakes.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman state how he has ascertained which regiments are to be mustered out?

Mr. MAGINNIS. Because all above the Fifteenth are to be mustered out.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Oh, no; the question which regiments shall be mustered out is left to the President.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The gentleman will find that I am correct. They will be mustered out by high numbers.

How is it with the cavalry? Under this bill the Ninth and Tenth colored troops will pale their ineffectual fires on the Texas and New Mexican border. The Eighth Cavalry will leave the Texans destitute; and the Seventh (Custer's old regiment) goes out. Gentlemen, some of you know what the regiment is to a soldier: his country, his church, his home; its associations are his pride; its memories and its histories are his glory. But the old Seventh Regiment, the glorious regiment of Custer, will, by this bill, be blotted from the Army record as completely as his command was wiped out on the fatal river that now bears his honored name. Go further, and shoot poor old Comanche, the wounded and crippled clay-bank charger that carried Keogh to his death. He is mustered now with his troop. When you blot out his regiment the poor old horse, like many a brave old soldier, will have no home.

What regiments stay in? Every regiment that has been used to "bulldoze" a State, every regiment that has been used to weed out a Legislature, every regiment that has been used on political duty stays in.

The troops stationed at the arsenal to overawe Congress during the electoral count all remain. All these full artillery regiments which have been used for political duty and for police purposes remain in their casemates. The knife of this bill does not touch one of them. The cavalry and infantry—the useful troops, the old frontiersmen—go out. Yes, this is a good bill for the frontiers. Nor does the exuberant staff, of whose surplus growth we have heard so much disparagement, lose scarcely a leaf or a blossom. True, a commission is appointed to sit on it, which ultimately may nip it with killing frosts——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. I move to strike out the last word, Mr. Chairman, and yield my time to the gentleman from Montana.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman has recognized the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, whenever there has been an effort——

Mr. MAGINNIS. I wish to conclude my remarks.

Mr. SPARKS. If I can get the next five minutes I do not object to yielding for that purpose. The gentleman has already had twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that the Delegates from the Territories requested their chairman to be recognized, and when recognized they desired their time should be given to him, the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. I have taken the floor and given my time to the gentleman from Montana.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana will proceed.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy. Nor does the exuberant staff lose to any great extent its lovely leaves or blossoms. True a commission is to be appointed to sit on it, which may ultimately nip it with a killing frost several years from now, but the chances are that it will escape as heretofore. The line neither on the field nor in the senate ever gets a respite, and, worse than all, my honored friend, the chairman of the Military Committee, to whom I will give the credit of ever feeling a warm interest in the line and a warm desire to promote its efficiency, gives his reluctant consent to this bill. Et tu, Brute? He has been the bugbear of the staff. Now let us reverse the principles of this bill, legislate the staff out, and let the commission sit on the line to see if we have more than we want. But, gentlemen, if there is such a thing as military science and we have any men in this country fit to rank as experts, why not let the whole subject go to a commission? Fix the limit of your annual expenditures and let them lay before us a plan of the best army we can have for the money.

Mr. Chairman, the frontier would like to see your so-called peace establishment definitely settled. The Army would like above all things to have its status defined. This uncertainty weakens its morale and destroys its content. Officers enter the service with the idea that, as they lay aside all other chances of fame and fortune and devote themselves to the service for life, the Government assures them a life career. On this idea the character of the Army is built. In honor and integrity its escutcheon has been unsullied. This is true of the great leaders of the Union armies, and equally true of those whose genius and character shed luster on the southern cause. The highest officers in our Army are poor in purse, simple in character, and democratic in all their instincts; no Americans are more so; and of Lee, and Johnston, and Jackson, and Longstreet, and all of the old Army officers that went with their States, many bitter things have in partisan fury been said. But among all the tongues that have wagged and pens that have splashed them with such epithets as rebel or traitor, the most malicious never has sullied their fair fame with the degrading epithets of plunderer or knave. This high character was the result of the system in which they were reared. Let us not shake the faith of the Army in its stability.

Mr. Chairman, the new States and Territories will not be much longer a tax on your military establishment. The silver and gold mines which vein our mountains have been the cause of great disturbance and development. Civilization has leaped eastward over the Sierras to meet the westward waves from the border States. Towns and villages nestle between the granite ribs of the great backbone of the mountains, and the church and school-house crown the golden summit of the continent. The great desert has been found to be fertile. The mysteries of the Colorado cañons have been revealed; and the sources of the Yellowstone, the last geographical problem in North America, but a few years ago remote, mysterious, and unknown as the fountain of the Nile, have been traced to this origin, and that enchanted land of Alpine peaks and crystal lakes and dizzy waterfalls, gorgeous cañons, boiling pools, and geysers that cast into insignificance all other fountains of this world, has been dedicated as a national pleasure ground, a wonderland for prosperity to wander in and admire. The Yellowstone itself—a name of legend and romance, suggesting Lewis and Clark, and Coulter and Bonneville, the land of remoteness and mystery—is now traversed by a line of steamers. Gentlemen, the frontiers will call on you for aid but a few years more. Civilization and savagery are in their last desperate grapple. Another decade and the lines will have closed up, the reservations will be surrounded by farms, the north and south Pacific railroads will be constructed, the last Territory will be a State, and we will have no frontier that is not washed by the ocean or does not face on a foreign country.

I ask my friends on this side who love the traditions of the great democratic party, which has been peculiarly the party of American ideas—a party which carried our flag from Lundy's Lane to New Orleans, and from Florida to Mexico; which bought one empire and conquered another, and added star after star to our flag, and State after State to our Union, until it reached the shores of the western sea; which shaped our land policy and our immigration laws, and always represented the progress and development of our country, the patriotic pride of its people, and always conquered its opponents in that sign—I ask if you will change your old policies or withdraw your old sympathies from the border people who are founding new Commonwealths on the land your policy gave the Republic. Will you desert us in the very crisis of our last struggle with savagery, or will you continue to give, as your great leaders always gave us, such generous sympathy and ready aid as will make our victory speedy, sure, and glorious. [Great applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee informally rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair,

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A bill (S. No. 1060) authorizing the Secretary of War to erect headstones over the graves of Union soldiers who have been interred in private, village, or city cemeteries; and

A bill (S. No. 1241) to provide for the service of process in cases of interpleader in the courts of the United States.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 3364) regulating the appointment of justices of the peace, commissioners of deeds, and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, had agreed to the conference asked by the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DORSEY, Mr. INGALLS, and Mr. HARRIS conferees on the part of the Senate.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session and the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose on this occasion to make a set speech on this subject. I have already on a former occasion discussed the provisions of this bill. But I desire now to say in answer to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] that he can very likely always find some interested party to refer to as evidence that the Army should not be reduced. He has directed our attention to somebody in the gallery who occupies a position in the Army to whom he somewhat defiantly refers us as ready and willing to sanction his statement "that the Army should not be reduced." I have heard that kind of argument before, in fact have heard it ever since I have heard anything. If you will ask men whose interests are all adverse to a reduction and act upon the advice they give you on the subject, of course you will never reduce the Army. But, sir, I do not propose to ask them. I propose to deal with the United States Army as the representatives of the people in their legislative capacity ought to deal with it. I would deal with it justly and fairly, but I would strenously insist always that the civil should be superior to the military power, and that all men in civil or military life must sanction that as a correct rule of action in our democratic country.

I do not complain of the alacrity with which the Delegates representing the Territories rush into this debate in opposition to this bill. I do not censure them for it; it is quite reasonable and natural that they should do so. For you are not likely to find the people of a Territory who are not in favor of a large Army and who would not like to have a large share of that Army in their midst.

Mr. PAGE. Why?

Mr. SPARKS. Everybody knows that when you have an Army in a thinly populated Territory the people of that Territory get high prices for their productions. Thus it was that the army under General Johnston in 1856, sent there to punish or subdue them, in fact made the pioneer settlers of the Territory of Utah rich.

But, sir, my object on rising was mainly to speak of the number of the Indians and the danger to be apprehended from them. Of my own personal knowledge I do not know the facts, but I have gone to the Department of the Government where we should get information on the subject, and have stated in my place here that from the best information attainable from that Department there are in the United States (excluding Alaska) at this hour not exceeding, all told, two hundred and twenty-five thousand Indians, of whom the great body are as harmless and peaceable as can be reasonably desired. Who are the warlike Indians? Of course there are a good many that can be regarded as such, and I would be the last man to insist that we should not protect our people on the frontier or in their midst against them. But who and where are they? I mention the Sioux and those allied to and fraternizing with them. I mention the Kiowas and Comanches and Cheyennes or parts of all these tribes, and just at this moment I cannot recall any others.

There may be other straggling bands, but I state, as based upon a study of the subject, that there are not of absolutely untamed, unsubdued, and warlike Indians, those who have the disposition in their hearts for the war-path at this hour, exceeding twenty-five thousand or thirty thousand from whom danger can be apprehended. And I distinctly state here, and defy contradiction from any man of the Army or elsewhere who has a reputation worth considering, that not now or at any time within the probabilities of the future can there be reasonable apprehension that more than five thousand Indian warriors can be arrayed against the Government of the United States. Why, sir, look at this late Indian outbreak; I mean the Sitting Bull war. That was an outbreak among the tribes, led by a chieftain that was likely to arouse all the warlike Indians in that most turbulent and dangerous region of Indian territory. Now, how many warriors were there in the field? Does any gentleman pretend to say that there were anything like five thousand, or the half of it? Now, sir, I would insist as strongly as any man on having a force sufficient to repel the aggressions of that class of warlike Indians; and we have that force, and more than that force. But the trouble about it is—and there is where the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] make their mistake—it is not for the want of a sufficient force; but, in place of putting the Army where the Army ought to be, it is put where it ought not to be; it has been too largely the object of the late constitutional Commander-in-Chief, who controlled it, to be more interested in carrying elections and securing fraudulent Presidents than in protecting the frontier and the pioneer settler in the midst of danger.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PRIDEMORE. When I listened to the gentleman from Montana I had feelings akin to those produced by the recital of my nurse in my infant days of the horrid deeds of Black Hawk and Osceola, such was the eloquence and such was the power of the gentleman. But I tell him that the history of this land will not bear him out in the assertion that the regular Army has cleared the forest and moved on to the West in that grand era of civilization which now marks that country. It has been the tiller of the soil who stood with loaded gun in his own field who has made his way through the savage land and brought to it civilization.

Sir, to-day while we are speaking constantly about the Army and the appropriation of the people's money for the support of the Army, there is another army in this country without bread; and if you will give them free transportation across the railroads built by their labor, if you will give them half the lands that you donated to railroads, I tell the gentleman from Montana an army of ten thousand will rush to his relief and settle up his waste lands and protect him from the savage.

Sir, the laborers of this land are pleading for relief, and yet we have stood here seven months and not one solitary bill has been brought forward to relieve them. But the epaulets, the uniforms, the brass buttons, the railroads, the monopolies, everything else can find friends and supporters, bills and lobbies, money and men and eloquent support; except agriculture and labor, the citizens who are the bone and sinew of the land, the balance-wheel of society, its support in peace, its soldiers in war, are forgotten in the whirl of business; and we find selfishness and sectional interest in the ascendant. The Army! The Army!

Mr. GARFIELD. And the Navy forever!

Mr. PRIDEMORE. The Army for the Territories! That Army that has been forced to shield these same followers to steal the Indian's blanket, and goaded him to deeds of desperation and justified him in acts of murder. The Army that will sap the foundations of that democratic gentleman's own liberty; when he has given it sufficient authority in his Territory to command the Indians it will then command the whites.

Sir, I speak this in no hostility to the Army. If I had anything to admire as a southern soldier it was the kind treatment of the Army as compared with that other and most detestable class of "bomb-proofs" who sought to pillage under the guise of belonging to the Army while they were in fact nothing but army followers. I have naught to say against it but to state to the committee some of its evils. But I have a right as a Representative, believing as I conscientiously do that the protection which we give to the Army and to the corporations of the land is to-day centralizing and consolidating and working out the ruin of the very liberties which we are sent here to protect—and I will avail myself of this opportunity to call attention to some of the dangers—that spirit of protection which is so fatal to the progress and well-being of society, and which has found of late a firm lodgment in our own system of laws both State and Federal. By protection I mean not only tariff, but that watchful care given by enactments to the ordinary affairs of mankind, and without which some would have us believe a country cannot prosper, but with which I am bold to assert no country can properly advance. Under protection classes may and indeed do grow powerful, wealthy, boastful, and even arrogant, but the very system which fosters and feeds them begets a spirit of hostility that eventually drags them from power and hastens their ruin. Witness our national-bank system, whose growth in numbers and power is unequaled by anything heretofore known to us; yet that very power now so boastfully asserted by them has aroused the hatred and just indignation of labor, which stands menacing at their very doors. It is alike true that protection has made giants of our railroads and dwarfs of our production, until a voice of condemnation rises up from all parts of the country against their exclusive privileges, their unjust and dishonest discriminations. This same spirit of protection has burdened our commerce, lessened our exports, and embarrassed our trade.

It has carried its baleful influence into our internal policy until there is hardly to be found an enterprise throughout the whole land not privileged by law and enriched by protection. Individual enterprise has been crushed out by co-operative capital, made strong and oppressive by the shield of protection. Harmony of interests unites the protected, as they make common cause against the people, upon whose rights they have long trespassed, and from whose hard earnings they have drawn their wealth; whose Government they have disgraced by their lobby and whose money they have stolen under the forms of laws. Railroads go hand in hand with banks; high tariff with patent rights and manufacturing monopolies, laboring in concert that each may retain its separate and several advantages. Conscious of their united strength they bid defiance to the people's will; turn a deaf ear to their cry of distress. I have watched with some impatience the sufferings and wrongs of labor, whose toil created the very wealth that now assumes to dictate its oppression. The hardy laborers whose hands and toil felled our forests, constructed our roads, and built up our cities, and who still bear the burden of society, have given by their inventive genius to the world its greatest advancement in arts, sciences, and mechanics. And these men have long grappled in their weakness with that wealth and power which has flown from their toils and been wrenched from their privations. Too weak, as yet, they "must toil on" says capital; ay "starve on," until some whirl of fortune's wheel shall give them aid. Still if capital was as wise as it is selfish, tyrannical, and arrogant, it might see the gathering storm that will hurl its obstinate folly from power.

I have heard upon this floor the manly appeals in behalf of labor rights; have cheerfully voted for laws in its aid. I have listened, too, to the cold, steely reason of the assumed rights of capital. May I be pardoned, Mr. Chairman, for asserting the rights of a class equally worthy and far more numerous and far more oppressed and who I have the honor largely to represent upon this floor? That class is the producing farmer, the great balance-wheel of society, who so far in the contest of labor against capital has remained silent save only in sympathy. The farmers and producers are the foundation of all wealth, the source of all prosperity; but their isolated condition, away from crowded cities, railroad centers, and scenes of excitement makes them slow of motion; but their numbers make them powerful in action. Neither a capitalist, nor yet strictly a laborer, with his own hands toiling upon his own soil, obedient to law, and understanding his interests, the farmer has ever held as sacred as the capitalist the right to acquire and hold property; still as a laborer he has ever stood by the rights of labor. Thus balancing the two extremes he has been, as he should ever be, regarded as the firmest and most reliable friend of our form of government; yet your laws read as if and their effect sustains the farmer in the belief that his prosperity is sought to be crippled if not made subservient to all other pursuits. Such is the effect upon him and his vocation that all over the country the farmers have condemned protective laws and demand their repeal. No direct enactments can be found against him. None so bold as to openly oppose him, but his rights have been invaded by the stealthy and dangerous form of protection to others. It is by long-continued and oft-renewed patents upon the implements of husbandry; by reckless grants to corporations of the public domain—the common heritage of all; by conferring powers upon manufacturers that have grown into monopolies; by a high rate of tariff on an unreasonable number of the articles of his consumption, thus putting an embargo upon the exports of his production. By enforcing a cumbrous and unjust system of internal-revenue laws that have rendered sterile and barren an abundant and fruitful soil by forcing the production of tobacco for sale into warehouses protected by law from competition, save from their own class. These protective revenue laws have magnified into crimes the acts of men pursuing in good faith the Government's construction of its own laws. They have dragged our people an unreasonable distance to court to answer frivolous and false charges of a penal character; sent among us secret agents laboring in the interests of monopoly and protection—themselves interested in the fees of arrests—and all this that the manufacturer in consideration of the tax paid by him for protection. And, worst of all, by the inauguration of a system of national banking that has drawn from him the meager capital necessary to his existence, which has imposed upon him ruinous rates of interest, by exempting from taxation the bonds of the wealthy, and thus forcing upon production the whole burden of supporting the Government. It is these things I say that have awakened him from his slumbers and should arouse him to action. All these and much more has the farmer borne until longer silence would be criminal in him. For him, then, and in his name I demand for production and productive labor, not protection, but an equal chance in the great struggle for life. Moreover, he demands that the national residence be cleared from the disgrace of a hireling lobby that seeks to traduce and entrap by skillfully drawn laws in favor of protection the very best interests of agriculture. And in these demands he is but a co-laborer with labor, with whose interests when fully united we venture to predict they will, as they ought and have the power to do, control this Government, shape its destiny, and dictate its laws. Farmers have been long silenced upon the plea that politics is not their calling. Not so. They are, as I have already said, the "foundation of wealth," the "pillars of prosperity," and the custodians of that intelligence and virtue necessary to the preservation of a true republican form of government. They of all others are best fitted and most likely to form that power which will reclaim our former exemption from protection and restore the laws and forms prevailing in the older and better days of our history.

A glance at the prevailing financial policy of contraction urged by bankers and opposed by farmers may serve in part to confirm what we have said. I shall not tabulate or go lengthily into figures, but one comparison will be sufficient. In 1865, say 1st of August, we had in circulation of all kinds of money about $2,000,000,000. In 1877 we had only about $800,000,000, an absolute reduction in twelve years of $1,200,000,000; through all which time real estate continued to decline; bank stocks, railroad and Government bonds gradually to rise. Through all this time the South has never had a circulation commensurate with the demands of trade. The evils of resumption, therefore, reached us in the critical hour of only partially restored prosperity. Since contraction would most affect a country already only partially supplied with a medium of trade, it is no wonder that we see everywhere in the South and West suspensions, bankruptcy, and ruin. Seven months of the present session have made no advance upon these corporate powers. So far no removals of protection, no relief to unemployed labor, failing tradesmen or languishing farmers. At other times and on other occasions it might be proper to discuss what power should issue money, the kind and quantity; but the exigencies of the hour demand relief. Demand a new or a reissue of "greenbacks," followed up by a policy that will put them in circulation for the use of the people. A long-suffering people cannot longer wait for forms, cannot delay the urgent business of life for protracted discussion. I feel some encouragement, however, in the assembling forces apparent everywhere, whose aim is opposition to protection. And vain indeed will be the demands for protection and privilege when in the near future farmer and laborer, mechanic and tradesman, shall rally in a united effort to demand from all parties a recognition of equal chances and equal rights for all.

Protection is the means, consolidated and centralized power in the Government the end, that now most of all evils threatens our national prosperity, if not our very existence. Conscious power may scoff at warning, may disregard the humble petitions of the cultivators of the soil, may even laugh at "labor strikes" and "communistic parades." It must not be forgotten, however, that communism ever has done much for the rights of man, and that plebeian power has never been wanting in men or means to wage a constant and often triumphant contest with capital and tyranny; as often governing as governed; and in no country has the people, the common people if you choose to put it that way, such absolute power as in this. Think you that they do not know it, or, knowing it, do not dare to use it? Await the issue! Do nothing for their relief, turn away from the justice of their plea, and then awaken, as you will, to the realization of their power, staggering to the cool philosophy with which many seem now too inclined to regard the popular voice, so outspoken upon the wrongs of protection. I beg you give to labor the chance and the right to toil and work for fair and reasonable wages; it is all it asks. Give to producers, farmers, and tradesmen an equal chance with bankers, incorporated manufactures, and subsidized railroads. They demand no more; they will be content with no less.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, in the short space of time to which I am limited in this debate I shall endeavor to confine myself to the one single question that has already been settled by the committee and will come before the House for its vote, and that is the question as to the extent and size of the effective force of enlisted men in the Army. I am one of those upon this floor who are opposed to any reduction in the effective force of the Army as it is now provided for by law. And, Mr. Chairman, it is a little curious in listening to the discussion that has taken place upon this floor to find that the opposition to a reduction of the Army comes from those sections of the country where the Army is most needed. From those sections a unanimous voice is raised against its reduction. Go to the Territories of the West, go to those regions of the country which are annually and monthly threatened with incursions from Indians, and the unanimous voice of the people there is against a reduction of the Army.

Mr. Chairman, there is another feature in this debate to which I desire to call attention and it is this: the gentleman who reports this bill and who has charge of it upon this floor proposes to make a reduction of five thousand of the enlisted forces of the Army and to make that reduction from those branches of the service which are alone employed in defending the borders of our country from the incursions of the Indians. I have the highest respect for that gentleman, both for his ability, his patriotism, and for his industry, but he represents what? He represents the Atlantic border coast of this country. He represents that portion of this country where the only branch of the Army required is the artillery branch. Has he made any attack upon that branch of the service? Does he propose to reduce the artillery branch of the Army one solitary man? Oh, no. New York City needs the artillery to protect the great harbor of the city which the gentleman in part represents. It is not defended by infantry or cavalry, but by artillery, and he leaves the artillery branch of the service at its full maximum as now provided for by law. This reduction of five thousand men is a reduction in the infantry and cavalry branches of the Army which are needed for the protection of the frontier and for opening to development our western territory.

Mr. Chairman, there is a common remark made by our friends upon the other side of the House, and they make it because there is a cry from the western country for protection at the hands of the Army—there is a common cry that they are willing to give the Territories all the soldiers they need to protect them from Indian incursions. Why do they strike in this bill only at that branch of the Army that does afford protection to the people of the borders? And why do they retain in full force that branch of the Army which gives protection to the Atlantic seaboard?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, a good deal of misapprehension exists in regard to the expensiveness of the Indian service. Efforts are being made by parties who are more interested in themselves than they are in the public welfare to convince the public mind that a very great saving would be had if that service were transferred to the War Department. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BOONE,] in the discussion of this bill, presented some considerations on this subject which, in my opinion, are not warranted by the facts; and I think in the few minutes that I am allowed I may be able to convince the gentleman himself that this is the case.

It must be borne in mind that since 1851 the Indian population has increased 137,234, more than double what they then were. The expense of the management might well be proportionately larger, and yet, notwithstanding that fact, it is nevertheless true that the expenses of the Indian Bureau have only increased from $147,033.40 in 1851 to $176,809.10 in 1877, and were actually $195,550.68 in 1855. The gentleman states the expense of the Indian service at $602,907, most of which he says could be saved if a transfer were made of the Indian Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department. Now, sir, what are the actual facts in this respect? The pay of superintendents and agents is $84,233.44, special agents $6,054.24, interpreters $30,639.26, clerks $3,405.84, inspectors $10,258.24, and incidental expenses $20,026.17; making a total of $176,806.10.

Now, whether the Indian Bureau remains with the Interior Department or is transferred to the War Department, we must continue the following employés in the service, by virtue of our treaty stipulations and because the well-being of the Indian and the future peace and prosperity of this country demand it: 41 physicians, 64 farmers, 78 teachers, 19 matrons, 14 cooks, 6 laundresses in boarding-schools, 42 carpenters, 19 millers, 9 sawyers, 11 engineers, 54 blacksmiths, 7 storekeepers, 37 herders, 14 teamsters, 3 butchers, 1 tinsmith, 1 gunsmith, 1 detective, 8 policemen, 3 watchmen, 158 laborers, and 60 interpreters.

Then again the pay of the regular employés is $316,452.94 and the pay of temporary employés is $21,104.22, making a total of $338,016.16, and this amount must be taken out of the $600,000 which the gentleman from Kentucky says can be saved.

The only possible saving would be simply the salaries of superintendents and agents as aforesaid, $84,233.44, supposing that no additional employés are necessary, for most if not all of the four hundred and sixty-eight employés of the service are provided for in treaties made with the different tribes of Indians; and unless we intend to wantonly violate our treaties, we must continue to furnish them. Although the War Department may have the management of the Indians in the future, Army officers could not fill these various places, and persons in civil life would of necessity be employed.

In the published remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BOONE] there is set forth a letter from Captain Nash, commissary of subsistence. Captain Nash states in that letter that he inspected eight hundred thousand pounds of flour according to sample furnished him, and fully equal to the sample, and that it was not such flour as should have been furnished to the Indians. How was this flour purchased? A board of Indian commissioners, composed of as upright, as pure, as honest, and as capable men as this country affords, together with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, make the necessary contracts. The flour is purchased by sample furnished by bidders. After the purchase is made, these samples are divided into four parts; one is sent to the Army officer who is assigned to inspect, another is sent to the Indian agent, another is retained in the Interior Department, and the fourth is given to the contractor. I have here in my hand a sample of the flour which the Commissioner of Indian Affairs says was furnished to Captain Nash and he was required to reject all flour not in every respect equal to the sample. I have submitted this sample to two competent men in this city, one of whom consumes large quantities of flour in his business (baking) and the other is an extensive dealer in that article.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] will withdraw the amendment I will renew it and yield my time to him.

Mr. NEAL. I will do so.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. I renew the amendment and yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NEAL. I thank the gentleman from Iowa. And they say that the sample of flour which I hold in my hand is equal to the flour which nine-tenths of the people of this country use. I am informed that this sample was sent to Captain Nash, and if so, and he received it and did his duty faithfully and conscientiously, the Indians had as good flour as our people generally have, and far better than the laboring class have had for a few years past. Where the fault is, if fault there was, I shall not undertake to determine. It may have been the case that the sample was changed before it fell into Captain Nash's hands. It is to be regretted that Captain Nash and all other inspectors appointed by the War Department do not promptly report such derelictions of duty to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that he might be able to remedy the evil and punish the wrong-doer.

Again, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BOONE] admits that the Indian Bureau makes purchases for a less sum than the War Department, but claims this is of small importance. Is it? Let us see. Last year the Indian Bureau purchased twenty million pounds of beef and seven million pounds of flour. The average difference in the prices paid by the Indian Bureau and that paid by the War Department was $2.92 per hundred pounds for the beef, and fifty-three cents per hundred pounds for the flour, in favor of the Indian Bureau. The sum of the difference on these two items alone in 1877 is $621,000, and this amount is saved by virtue of the purchases being made by competent civilians and not by Army officers.

I shall not undertake to determine where the fault was in this instance. I shall leave the controversy to be determined by Captain Nash and the commissioners. One thing is certain, that the persons who had charge of the purchasing did their duty in the premises; and I trust the matter will not be permitted to rest until it is ascertained at whose door the wrong-doing lies. Very possibly the sample was changed before it came to Captain Nash's hands.

Mr. CORLETT. Allow me to say to the gentleman that that is the way very often that it is done.

Mr. NEAL. That may be; if so, then it is the fault of the Post-Office Department or of the messengers employed to make the transfer.

Again, in regard to the question of beef. Anybody who has been among the Indians knows that these supplies are generally of sufficiently good quality. The beeves are not ordinarily required to be as heavy by the Indian Bureau as probably the War Department requires. Texas cattle, which are generally purchased for the Indians, are not generally as heavy as northern cattle, and therefore the standard weight required by the Indian Bureau is eight hundred and fifty pounds, while for Sonora cattle, which are naturally smaller and lighter, only six hundred and fifty pounds are required.

I intend, if opportunity presents itself, to make some remarks, supplemented by abundant facts, which will satisfy every candid man, I firmly believe, that it would not only be exceedingly detrimental to the best interests of the Indians but would add vastly to the expense of the administration of that service if the proposed transfer of the Indian service to the War Department is authorized by the action of this Congress.

One other consideration. In 1820 there were annuities paid to the Indians amounting to $152,575; in 1851 the annuities amounted to $868,883, and in 1877 they amounted to $2,843,763.98. Thus it will be seen that by virtue of treaty stipulations the annuities to the Indians have been increased to an amount exceeding $2,000,000 a year, which must be paid to them. This is charged as part of the expense of the administration of the Indian Bureau, although it is simply paying our honest debts, paying the Indians for the land which they held by virtue of possession running back for centuries, and it is a very small and inadequate consideration on our part.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I regret exceedingly, Mr. Chairman, that we have discussed upon this floor and have announced here so often the necessity for a large standing army in this country. It is a sure sign that we are taking steps rapidly toward a point against which our forefathers warned us. It would be infinitely better for us, in this the hundredth year of our national existence, if we could abolish the Army altogether and depend upon a system of volunteers or militiamen to accomplish the work, to a large extent, which we have assigned to the Army and daily call upon the Army to perform.

It has now become an unfortunate habit, whenever trouble of any character appears in this country, either in a county or in a State, or trouble of a national character, to rush to the General Government and seek the aid of the Army to extricate us from that trouble. It would be much better for us as a people if we could get rid of that habit altogether. In doing so we would become a more independent and self-sustaining people. Teach a people to depend upon themselves, upon their own State legal forces, and we will have a more stable and conservative government.

A few days ago we heard here in this House an eloquent speech from the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in which he attacked the idea of Lord Macaulay's distrust of our form of civil government. I will say that it was a speech of great power on that side of the question. It was a speech that touched the popular heart in this Congress, as it was to a great extent a brave argument in favor of our own form of government, and of the opportunity here presented for every one to work himself up from the substratum of society to the most elevated position in this Government, if possessed of ability, energy, and honesty. That idea has not had a more distinguished or marked illustration than in the gentleman himself, who, if I understand his history, has by his own unquestioned ability and indomitable energy worked up from a humble position until he occupies one of great eminence as a leading man in his own party and in the country. Such an example is worthy of imitation and should encourage all to struggle for such supremacy; but this is a land of self-made men; no born lords and rulers here; no via sacra to any special class.

But, sir, what is the vice of the gentleman's argument? From what he terms the result of the educational forces it would naturally follow that this Government would be a self-sustaining Government, that our people would be a self-sustaining people, always able to protect themselves against "communism" or any disorderly element that might undertake to create disturbance. But in the next breath he says we need a standing Army; for what? If our people are able to take care of themselves, as he indicates, for what do we need this Army? It is for the purpose of keeping down this very element which he says would be kept down by the educational forces.

I agree with the gentleman as to the importance and value of education. I go as far as any man in this Congress in advocating the necessity of education. I would extend that benefit to all. It is a blessing to all and should be enjoyed by all. If, in the language of the gentleman from Ohio, these educational forces will give us a self-perpetuating Government, stable and permanent, then it appears to me that standing armies should not be made a factor in the existence of that Government—should rather be considered anti-republican. The moment we concede that our Government has to be preserved and perpetuated by a standing Army, then Macaulay becomes a true prophet, and the "educational forces fail to accomplish their promised" good.

Let us see how this Army of ours has grown upon us from 1789 to the present time. In 1789 our Army numbered 840, costing $137,000. At the present time it is about 22,000, costing us the immense sum of $25,000,000.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MAYHAM obtained the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. CRITTENDEN.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I thank the gentleman from New York for his courtesy.

In order that the people may better know how the Army has grown in this country, I call attention to the following table:

[From the Annals of Congress.]

1789.—The Army of the United States consisted of 840 men; cost $137,000.
1790.—The Army was increased to 1,216 men, &c.
1791.—One regiment was added, 912 men, &c; cost $1,171,719.
1794.—One regiment of artillerists and engineers was added, 992 men, &c.
1794.—Total army, 3,120 men, &c.
1795.—All former acts repealed and an act passed to increase the Army to 5,793 of all arms.
1796.—An act reorganized the Army so that it consisted of 3,629 men of all arms.
1798.—An act added 744 men, &c., making total strength 4,364 men, &c.
1800.—An act authorizing the President to reduce the Army.
The above was the authorized strength of the Army at the period stated.

[From the American State Papers.]

Page 48.—From 1802 to 1808, inclusive, the average strength of the Army was 2,726 men and non-commissioned officers.
The average cost of the Army for the same period was $798,194.98.
The cost per man, including officers, was $292.80½.
Page 46.—Average strength of the Army, including officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, during the three years 1809, 1810, and 1811 was 6,000.
Average cost of the Army for the same period was $2,301,621.48.
Annual expense per man, including officers, was $383.60.

[From Reports of the Secretary of War.]

1844.—Strength of the Army, 8,573; cost, ——— ———.
1859.—Strength of the Army available, 11,000; cost, $13,098,725.
1877.—Strength of the Army, 25,000; cost, $31,597,270.68.
1877.—Annual cost per man, including officers, $1,263.80.

It seems to me that these figures are sufficient to show us that we ought to get rid of this tremendous expense and lift it from the shoulders of the people.

Look at the annual expenditure for the Army. It is useful to compare the expenditures of the War Department, as set forth in the last report of the Treasury, for the ten years of peace immediately preceding the rebellion and the ten years of peace since its close, allowing a margin of two fiscal years after the surrender at Appomattox for a starting point. The figures are instructive and astounding. Here they are in the official form:

1852	$8,521,506 19	1868	$123,246,618 62
1853	9,910,498 49	1869	78,501,900 61
1854	11,722,282 87	1870	57,655,675 40
1855	14,648,074 27	1871	35,799,991 82
1856	16,963,160 31	1872	35,372,157 20
1857	19,159,150 87	1873	46,323,138 31

Deduct ten years of peace to 1861			169,232,248 55
Excess in the last ten years			366,255,551 15

These figures prove that it has cost one-fourth of the national debt to keep up the Army during the last ten years of peace and more than three times as much as during the ten years preceding the civil war. What is there to show for this enormous outlay? Where has the money gone and what was it expended for? The time has at last come when this extravagance must stop and the system which breeds it must be cut up by the roots. The Army ought to be reduced to ten thousand men.

In the minds of some gentlemen there are two classes upon which the Army is to be used: the Indians and the commune element or working classes of our land; the latter as much as the former. I am for defending our western frontiersmen as much as any one on this floor. They should be protected as they bear westward our flag and our civilization. We must distinguish between the commune element and the laboring classes. There is a wide distinction between them, as wide as between any other classes in society. The former hold that property that is "social in its nature and use" instead of becoming personal in its ownership should be held in common by all mankind, the honest and industrious man to have no greater interest in it than the dishonest and shiftless vagabond. The former are turbulent members of society, with no restraints over their greed or passions but their own wild ideas of right and justice. The latter are an honest and industrious class, always ready to earn a living by the sweat of the brow, observing at all times a proper distinction between right and wrong, morality and immorality, and having a due regard for existing society and the law by which it is governed.

Of course there are some men among them who are riotous, disorderly, and communistic, and have at times brought a deep reproach upon their orders. The laboring class as a class should not be held responsible for those exceptions. Against the commune element, unbound by law, unrestrained by any kind of religion, prompted by no higher idea than to seize power by force, I am uncompromisingly opposed. Their success is the destruction of liberty, destruction of our form of Government, destruction of the sacredness of our homes, our rites and forms of religion, of the rights and privileges of society and property; and every man in our land who loves his country, whether rich or poor, bond or free, who believes that our Constitution is our chart and our laws are our guides, should resist the approaches and aggressions of such a body with all of the force of the law and the forces resulting therefrom. The laboring element want work, want reasonable wages, want the protection of the law. There is no necessity to increase the Army to repress those wants. Give that class work and you give it bread, and in giving it bread you have valuable members of society. I am astonished to hear gentlemen on this floor say that an increased Army is necessary to suppress such lawlessness as was seen in this country last summer.

If you are right in those fears, then was Lord Macaulay right in his views of the weakness of our form of Government? A standing army should never be a police force in this land. If you will have it to so act, then, with the light of history before me, I say in all earnestness, the life of your free Government is about extinguished. The pretorian guards are hard by and will soon sell your Presidency, your Senate, your Congress, to the highest bidder. Anarchy is always in the rear of arms and ready to seize the power. Ten thousand men are enough for our Army—enough to guard our frontiers on the West and our Rio Grande border. With honest dealing toward the Indians, they would soon become peaceable and quiet. They are almost an extinguished race, and in the name of justice let them no longer be driven to war by such hunger and nakedness as described by General Pope in a recent speech made at Cincinnati. Said he:

> The physical condition of the Indian is as bad if not worse to-day than I have ever known it. It is a fact so notorious as to require only the statement of it that the reservation Indians are insufficiently fed at all times, and that for considerable periods during each year they are in a condition of want and suffering revolting to humanity. It is also true that in many cases the articles of food to be daily issued to them are specified in detail in the treaties, but only in part are furnished, and at times not furnished at all. In short, it is the fact that thousands of Indians placed on reservations by the actual use of superior force are slowly starving.

If a few of those dishonest agents were dealt with as Napoleon did with some quartermasters, peace would reign along our whole frontier. Then there would be no necessity for such an eloquent appeal for a larger Army as we have had here to-day from the accomplished Delegate from Montana, [Mr. MAGINNIS.] Their frontiersmen would then be able to protect themselves with their brave arms and buoyant hearts. Sir, I greatly admire such spirits. Those forerunners of liberty, society, and law are bold, self-reliant, and independent, and under no circumstances would I place them under the tutelage of an army.

I am asked how I would suppress another such a mob as was had in this country last summer. Deal justly in the first place between man and man, and we will never have another. If it should come let the States, the counties, the cities, the towns suppress it—our own militia and constabulary forces, even if it takes the last man, the last child. It was so done in Missouri, it was so done in Ohio, it was so done in Illinois, it was so done in Kentucky; only a few alarmed governors acted otherwise by appealing to the Government for troops. Organize the militia in all the States and such appeals will never be heard again, and we will no longer have calls for large standing armies. They should be considered the military arm of this Government. A standing army is an evil. Mr. Madison said:

> A standing army is one of the greatest mischiefs that can possibly happen. * * * The Constitution does not say a standing army shall be called out to execute the laws. * * * The militia ought to be called out to suppress smugglers. Will this be denied? * * * If riot should happen the militia are proper to quell it, to prevent resort to another mode. (2 Elliott, 287.)

And in these words of Mr. Alexander Hamilton, the aristocrat and centralizationist of the Constitution:

It is said standing armies are not provided against in the Constitution, and hence it is inferred they would exist under it. This inference, from the very form of the proposition, is at best but uncertain and problematic. * * * The attention of the Government ought particularly to be directed to the formation of a select corps of militia of moderate size, upon such principles as would fit it for service in time of need. This, it appears to me, is the only possible substitute for a standing army and the best possible security against it if it should exist.—Federalist.

As late as the Congress of 1809, John Randolph expressed the same dread of a standing army in these words:

I believe that they (the people of the United States) are not content and never would be content to see a standing army, fully equipped, armed, and disciplined, while the militia, our defense against internal as well as external enemies, remained unarmed and defenseless * * * The people who will consent to remain unarmed while arms are put in the hands of a standing army, governed by martial law, are ripe for a master.

In the Congress of 1810 Mr. Potter, of Rhode Island, expressed like apprehension. Speaking of the militia, he said:

If this shall not be found to answer the expectation of military men, and we shall hereafter have a President of more military habits, the next change would be a large standing army. And this is the way republicanism usually slides into despotism.

Let us take warning by the counsel of such men and avoid an expensive standing army in times of peace.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Chairman, in all that I have said upon this bill I have been animated by but one purpose: to maintain the regular Army at its present standard for the protection of our frontier. I think there was really no necessity for raising the question of using the Army for other purposes, whether these purposes were predicated on the necessity of using the Army in States recently in rebellion and still in unsettled condition or to meet requisitions from governors, under the Constitution, to preserve peace and order in any State on account of riot or turbulence. In this contest we propose to provide no new force for such a purpose. We have not had and it is impossible we should have, with the regular Army at its present standard, a large spare force for any such purposes, whether these purposes were proper or not.

Sir, whenever in the past an Indian war has broken out we have not had men enough to subdue it promptly and economically as we ought to have been able to subdue it. Insignificant difficulties with Indians have grown into great expensive wars while we were waiting to gather troops from many distant posts. Settlers have been fearfully exposed meanwhile. Every Indian war has been protracted for years though it might have been ended in a few months. In this system of false economy we have wasted many hundreds and thousands of lives, many millions of dollars. I say, therefore, there is sufficient reason why we should maintain the Army at its present standard. That is the only question that need to have entered into this discussion. To man the forts on our seaboard, to guard the posts and forts on the three thousand miles of northern frontier, to protect the turbulent Mexican frontiers of fifteen hundred miles, and keep in check several hundred thousand of fierce, warlike savages, roaming over the interior, needed every man and every musket. The questions as to maintaining the integrity and perpetuity of the Union, the civil rights of all our citizens, and the preservation of the order and tranquillity of the country, are legitimate questions in their own place and time.

But, Mr. Chairman, during the course of this debate much has been said as to the use of the Army in the States by the republican party which has been in charge of the Government for the past fifteen years. We have barely closed a civil war unparalleled in all history. The Republic rescued from its peril has been in the hands of the gallant republican party that saved it, and because that republican party endeavored to secure the results of that war by the employment of a small number of men in those States lately in rebellion and still full of murder and turbulence, it has been held on this floor that our party has transcended constitutional limits and invaded rights and powers sacred to the Constitution and that their acts are subversive of the principles of the Government. Sir, I heard the late President say that under his administration he never sent troops to South Carolina and Louisiana, except when they were called for by the governors of those States in accordance with the Constitution of the United States, and that he did not think they had ever been used but when they were needed for public peace and for the preservation of law and the guaranteed rights of citizens. The charge that the republican party has exceeded the just powers of government confided to them, or that they ever for a moment wished to weaken or undermine the Republic they had just preserved is a charge as preposterous as it is false.

I wish before I close to have one paper read at the Clerk's desk. During the administration of Mr. Buchanan there was some disturbance in Virginia. A brave, historic man of my State, John Brown of Osawatomie, invaded Virginia about the time. Of the circumstance or the causes that led to it, I have nothing to say at present. History will faithfully record and justly estimate it; but the paper I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read is an extract from the official report of Colonel Robert E. Lee, then of the regular Army, afterward a commanding general of the rebel army. Without a single requisition by the governor of any State, but merely on a simple rumor, troops of the United States from the United States post at Harper's Ferry, which he then commanded, invaded the State of Maryland. I ask that the paper be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HARPER'S FERRY, October 19, 1859.

Colonel S. COOPER,
Adjutant General United States Army, Washington City, D. C.:

* * * * * * *

About nine o'clock this evening I received a report from Mr. Moore, from Pleasant Valley, Maryland, that a body of men had about sunset descended from the mountains, attacked the house of Mr. Gennett, and from the cries of murder and the screams of the women and children, he believed the residents of the valley were being massacred.

* * * * * * *

The report was, however, so improbable that I could give no credence to it, yet I thought it possible that some atrocity might have been committed, and I started with twenty-five marines under Lieutenant Green, commanded by Lieutenant Stewart, for the scene of the alleged outrage, about four and a half miles distant. I was happy to find it a false alarm. The inhabitants of Pleasant Valley were quiet and unharmed, and Mr. Gennett and his family safe and asleep.

R. E. LEE, Colonel Commanding.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I have no comment to make as to its necessity, no criticism as to the act, but I wish simply to state that during the last democratic administration Colonel Lee carried United States troops on mere rumor into a neighboring State. He who went into rebellion against the Government that educated him as a soldier, because he was a stickler for State rights, did not deem this an invasion of State rights. The democratic administration of Buchanan did not deem it an invasion of State rights. It was reserved for the democratic party, a party which as such sympathized to some extent with rebellion, to criticise as an invasion of State rights the just and discreet steps to preserve the Union and maintain the peace.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Chairman, I have heard on this floor to-day, in answer to the eloquent and fair statement of the Delegate from Montana, [Mr. MAGINNIS,] such an unfair reply, such an outrageous charge, that I deem it my duty, standing here as I do a member of this House with twenty-five years of border experience in my life, to say just one word or two on the subject of the necessity of more troops for the suppression and prevention of Indian hostilities upon our frontier. It was stated by the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] that all these Territories wanted troops because the location of troops there would sell their farm products—their butter and their eggs, I suppose. Here is the authoritative declaration of the governor of Kansas, under date of October 20, 1877, and that State comes here and through one of its members presents a bill to this House for its consideration appropriating half a million dollars for expenses incurred in the protection of that State from the incursions of Indians. I want the Clerk to read that portion which I have marked, to show you what my own State has passed through in an Indian war which only closed in 1870.

When that is read I desire to read from the general statutes a few items of appropriations of money which this Government was forced to pay simply because there were not troops enough on our frontier for its protection. And there never will be troops enough until, irrespective of party, Congress shall pay attention to the needs of the frontier and supply a standing Army of sufficient size to insure adequate protection.

The Clerk read as follows:

During the entire summer and fall and until the approach of winter the Indians continued in open hostility against the settlements and in defiance of United States authority.

But for the aid of the Kansas battalion still other atrocities would have followed, still other houses been burned, growing crops destroyed, and property carried off until desolation and hunger had driven the last surviving settler from his home along the entire border.

This ever-memorable series of Indian wars in Kansas, covering a period of six years, was brought to a close in 1870, the State suffering only from roving bands during that summer; and in November of that year, with hands yet red with the blood and belts hanging full with the scalps of defenseless citizens, the hostile Indians returned to their respective agencies to ask of the Government more bread, new blankets, and better arms.

During this protracted and unequal contest more than a thousand patriotic good citizens of the State were killed by Indians, and the loss of property to individual settlers by theft and destruction aggregated more than a million of dollars.

The history of this eventful and disastrous period, as made up of official records, shows beyond dispute or cavil that the enemy held in check at the cost of the State, and by the valor and sacrifice of its citizens, was the enemy of the United States, an enemy from whose ravages it was the duty of the General Government to protect the State.

Mr. HASKELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have here the general statutes of the United States, to which I wish particulary to call attention. Here is an appropriation of $18,000 to the State of Iowa for repelling an Indian invasion. I turn over a few pages and on March 3, 1863, an appropriation of $250,000 was made for repelling an Indian invasion in the State of Minnesota. Here a few pages further on is an appropriation of $125,000 to the State of Minnesota for repelling an Indian invasion. Here again is an appropriation of $900,000 given for repelling Indian invasions in the State of Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HASKELL. Now just one word more in reply to the honorable gentleman from Virginia in the unjust and invidious attack he made on the volunteer soldiers of the Union Army. Does the honorable gentleman from Virginia forget from his side there came to the town of Lawrence in the State of Kansas a confederate colonel at the head of eight hundred of his ragamuffins, picked up from the borders, and burnt and pillaged that town and slaughtered eighty of its defenseless inhabitants? That man's name was Quantrell, carrying a confederate commission in his pocket. Therefore it ill becomes the honorable gentleman from Virginia to charge the Union troops with atrocities always perpetrated in times of war.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. EDEN. I call the gentleman to order, as he is speaking in violation of the rules.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I rise to a question of privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. No gentleman will be recognized until order is restored.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I rise to state——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear no gentleman until order is restored. [After a pause during which the committee came to order.] The gentleman from Kansas was not in order in continuing his remarks, the Chair having called him to order.

Mr. HASKELL. I do not care to say anything further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PRIDEMORE] is recognized.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. I rise to refer to and repel the covert attack which has been made on the southern soldiers, and to say that the statement of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, and whom I do not have the honor to know, in alleging that I made an attack on the Union Army is entirely gratuitous.

So far as my remarks when I formerly addressed the committee are concerned they did not contain one word in reference to the volunteers. I did not even mention the volunteer Army. So far as I had occasion to say anything of the conduct of the Union Army in the South, I said that they deserved great credit as compared with the bomb-proofs and the others who followed them. And I desire to say further, now that the war is ended, I have no regrets for the past; but I stand up now and here and declare that I am as ready to defend this Government as I was the government which I formerly served; and I will say that I believe now as I believed then, so help me God! I had the constitutional right to defend the principles I advocated.

The CHAIRMAN rapped to order.

Mr. PRIDEMORE continued to make some remarks which were rendered inaudible by the rapping of the gavel.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman was not in order in proceeding when the Chair called him to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot prevent a gentleman continuing to speak out of order.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Virginia did not say anything that the gentlemen over there need be troubled about.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It seems to be unprofitable labor to be fighting the lost cause over again. I ask unanimous consent to go back to line 35 and to offer an amendment to make the amount conform to the requirements of a bill based on a force of twenty-five thousand men.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to going back to line 35, that the gentleman from New York may offer his amendment?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I offer the following amendment:

In line 35 strike out "$8,390,000" and insert "$9,090,000;" so that it will read:

Pay department:

For pay of the commissioned and non-commissioned officers, privates, (including those employed as Indian scouts,) storekeepers, musicians, and veterinary surgeons, artificers, farriers, and saddlers, except as hereinafter enumerated, $9,090,000.

Mr. EDEN. Reserving the right to a vote on the amendment in the House.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes; reserving the right to a vote on the amendment in the House after a vote has been taken on the amendment, making the force twenty-five thousand.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following paragraph:

For extra-duty pay to enlisted men, $30,000.

Mr. MARSH. I move to strike out the last word.

I desire now to resume my remarks upon the subject of the reduction of the enlisted force of the Army. It has been claimed here and it has been admitted by gentlemen on the other side that you should have an army sufficient for all practical purposes, for all the purposes for which this country needs one. It is a common expression for them to say, we believe twenty thousand men are enough; or, we believe that fifteen thousand men are enough. Others say, we believe that ten thousand men are enough. And all concur in the opinion that twenty-five thousand men are too many.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us look at this matter in a reasonable light, in a business sort of way. I am ready, for the sake of argument, to take these gentlemen at their word when they say they are willing to have an army sufficient for all the purposes this country requires an army for. On what do they base their opinions that twenty thousand men are sufficient and twenty-five thousand men are too many? They cannot point to a solitary scintilla of testimony in all the evidence that has been given by the prominent military men in this country before the Committee on Military Affairs that justifies the reduction from twenty-five thousand to twenty thousand. Sir, fifty to seventy-five of these officers have been questioned on this subject and it is the unanimous testimony of them all that the necessities of the Army and the duties they have to perform absolutely require a force of twenty-five thousand enlisted men.

Now, are you going to pit your judgment against the judgment of these men? Who is there upon this floor that is capable of determining that question, unless we give weight to the opinion of men who are familiar with the duties of the Army and who are supposed to know the necessities of the service in which they are engaged?

The question has been asked on this floor several times, where is it that additional troops are needed? I call the attention of gentlemen to the testimony of General Gibbon, a very excellent officer in the regular Army and an officer who has been frequently and approvingly quoted by gentlemen on the other side. What does he state in his testimony? He is in command of the Department of Montana. I have not the time to read all his testimony, which gentlemen will find on page 272 of the evidence taken before the Military Committee. I will merely state its substance. General Gibbon says that he has about four hundred men in his department that he can muster for war. He says that this spring he expected to be obliged to take the field, and that that was the total number of the men he could muster for war. He tells you that there were confronting him on the northern frontier of Montana, across the border of British America, about four thousand or five thousand Sioux; and he tells you that the necessities of his department required two thousand men, an additional number of fifteen hundred or sixteen hundred over the number now under his command.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to say a word in reply to my colleague, [Mr. MARSH,] and for that purpose I renew the amendment. I merely desire to answer one remark made by him. I understood him to say that no Army officer is of the opinion that the Army can be safely reduced below twenty-five thousand men. I am acquainted with two distinguished generals, not now in active service, one of whom is a graduate of West Point and the other I think is, and they both, one in writing and the other, time and again, verbally, have asserted to me that ten thousand men properly handled would be sufficient force for the legitimate purposes of the Army at this day, and would be amply sufficient to protect the Indian and Mexican frontiers, and do all the duty that the Army ought to be required to do.

Mr. MARSH. I will simply say to my colleague that a great many gentlemen to my knowledge, who are ex-Army officers, think that a force of ten thousand men would be sufficient.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. These gentlemen are two of the most distinguished officers furnished by Illinois in the late war. They left the service of their own motion. As I have already said, I have the opinion of one of them in writing, and he has had sufficient experience to know whereof he writes. He says that an army of ten thousand men properly placed and managed could perform all the military service that this country needs at this time.

I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read as follows:

Subsistence Department:

For subsistence of 20,000 enlisted men, 120 additional half rations for sergeants and corporals of ordnance, 980 women to companies (laundresses), 1,875 civilian employés, 125 contract surgeons, 200 hospital matrons, 110 military convicts, and 500 prisoners of war, (Indians); in all 8,705,250 rations, at twenty-two cents each; for difference between cost of rations and commutation thereof for detailed men, and for enlisted men and recruits at recruiting stations, and for cost of hot coffee and cooked rations for troops traveling on cars; for subsistence stores for Indians visiting military posts, and Indians employed without pay as scouts, guides, and so forth, $2 215,000, less $300,000, heretofore appropriated, leaving a net appropriation under this act of $1,915,000.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. In lines 96 and 97, I move to strike out the words "eight million seven hundred and five thousand two hundred and fifty rations," and insert in lieu thereof "ten million three hundred and forty-seven thousand seven hundred and fifty rations."

Mr. SPARKS. Does that increase the amount?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It does increase the amount, but we need rations for the forty-five hundred men added to the Army by the amendment to the first section of the bill. I reserve the right of course to ask for a separate vote in the House upon all these amendments if it should become necessary by the refusal of the House to agree to the amendment to the first section of the bill.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman state what the aggregate increase of appropriation would be under these amendments?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The aggregate increase on the two items of subsistence and pay would amount to $1,060,000. There may also be additions to be made for incidental expenses in the Quartermaster-General's Department. I am not quite clear whether it would be necessary to move any amendments in that Department, but I will ascertain that, and I shall reserve a vote in the House upon all these amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move now to amend in lines 103 and 104 by striking out the words "two million two hundred and fifteen thousand dollars," and inserting in lieu thereof "two million two hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I desire to make a formal amendment. In line 89, where it reads "for subsistence of twenty thousand enlisted men," I move to strike out "twenty thousand" and insert "twenty-five thousand," so as to make it conform to the amendment already agreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York. Will the gentleman inform me what the words "and so forth" mean in line 103 where it reads "for subsistence stores for Indians visiting military posts, and Indians employed without pay as scouts, guides, and so forth."

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I wish to say to my colleague that I think the words "and so forth" must mean the debate which we have had here to-day.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York. I think it is hardly necessary to have that in the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. To be serious, I was informed by the Subsistence department that besides the pay of Indian scouts and guides there were occasionally instances in which it was necessary to use subsistence and they are some of the hardest cases that I know of in the history of our military operations. I am told that at the military posts the Indians come in in an absolutely starving condition. They have been defrauded by the Indian agents and the choice is whether they shall die of starvation in the presence of our officers and our Army, or whether they shall be relieved by such temporary assistance as can be given them from the surplus of subsistence supplies.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York. If this is to feed the Indians, just say so, if that is what it means. I recollect on one occasion, in the Legislature of the State of New York, where we had a report made from a certain officer of that State, in which there was an item something like this: "A. J. Hepburn, pork, and so forth." And when we came to dig into the matter we found that the "and so forth" meant a horse at $150 and one hundred and ninety-five bushels of oats to feed him on. [Laughter.] That was the "and so forth."

Now, let us have a straightforward provision here. If you mean to feed the Indians, let us say "to feed the Indians." I move to strike out those words, "and so forth." If the gentleman wants to have an appropriation to feed the Indians let him put it in there, and say wheat and corn for the Indians, and anything but whisky. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I must decline to accept that amendment for this reason, that the amount of the appropriation is calculated at the number of rations at twenty-two cents per head. These words "and so forth" do not increase the amount of money appropriated by the bill. The calculation is made on the number of rations; but to strike out those words would take away authority from the subsistence offices to allow a portion of the rations saved from the Army proper to be used for such purposes as I have named.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. PATTERSON, of New York, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and concluded the reading of the first section.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived, and that being the time fixed by the House at which it would take a recess, the committee will rise without further order and the Speaker pro tempore will resume the chair.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4867) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived, by previous order of the House the House now takes a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

DANIEL KANE.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4957) granting relief to Daniel Kane, late a fireman in the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. LORING. My name is on the Speaker's list of those who desire to be heard on the tariff question. My health is such that it is impossible for me to attend the sessions of the House, and I will soon be obliged to leave this city. I ask consent that I may have printed in the RECORD as a portion of the debates of this House some remarks that I have prepared upon that subject.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly. [See Appendix.]

JOHN F. SUTHERLAND & BROTHER.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table House bill No. 1951, which has been returned from the Senate with an amendment, for the purpose of concurring in that amendment. The bill was originally reported from the Committee of Ways and Means of this House, and I have consulted with the chairman of that committee [Mr. WOOD] and he assures me that the bill is all right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 1951) for the relief of John F. Sutherland & Brother, of Parke County, Indiana.

Mr. HUNTER. I will state briefly the object of this bill. The Government has a claim against the firm of John F. Sutherland & Brother. The Committee of Ways and Means of this House reported a basis upon which that claim should be settled. When the bill went to the Senate they changed the basis; that is all. The bill has passed this House twice, and does not take a dollar out of the Treasury. It only fixes a basis of settlement.

Mr. EDEN. What is the claim about?

Mr. HUNTER. These men have been fruit distillers on a very small scale, and there was a small tax deficiency. The Senate amendment provides that whenever they have paid the full tax on all the liquors manufactured by them, that shall be deemed a settlement of the claim against them. The amendment is all right and I move that it be concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate was read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "distillers," in lines 3 and 4 of the bill to the end of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

By receiving in full discharge thereof the amount of tax due upon the actual number of gallons of proof spirits produced by them, without further claim in the nature of damages, penalty, or other charge.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. HUNTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES BOMBONELL.

Mr. EDEN. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on War Claims upon an application for the withdrawal of papers in a case where there was an adverse report. The committee propose to recommend that leave be granted to Charles Bombonell to withdraw the papers in his case. I have here a written report, but I can state the facts in a few words.

The claim in this case was reported upon adversely in the Forty-third Congress, merely for the reason that the claimant was an alien. The committee declined to entertain his application for that reason; the merits of the case were not gone into at all.

Mr. ATKINS. Is there any money in this thing?

Mr. EDEN. Not at all. It is simply a proposition to give the claimant leave to withdraw his papers, so that if he has a remedy through his own government he can make application for it.

The report of the committee was received and the leave granted to withdraw the papers.

Mr. EDEN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THE REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. HANNA, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4958) to give further effect to sections 1225 and 1260 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DRY-DOCK IN BALTIMORE.

Mr. KENNA. I ask unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee on Commerce, for consideration at this time, Senate bill No. 1044, granting a site for a dry-dock in the city of Baltimore upon certain conditions. I can explain the object of the bill in a very few words, and if the House will hear the explanation, I think there will be no objection.

Mr. EDEN. I reserve all points of order upon the bill.

Mr. KENNA. The bill provides for granting three acres of land, of what is known as the Fort McHenry tract, in Baltimore, to the Baltimore Dry-Dock Company, upon which to construct a dry-dock. The bill provides that this company shall construct the dock within six months from the passage of the act, and prescribes its dimensions. The bill also provides that in consideration of this grant the dry-dock shall be free for all time for the use of the Government in repairing its vessels, without any charge to the Government whatever.

The report made by the Senate committee has been adopted by the Committee on Commerce of this House. That report contains letters from the Department and from the General of the Army and abundant evidence that the three acres of land can be spared without injury to the tract and without interfering at all with the military purposes for which this tract is held. I will also state that there is no dry-dock on the Chesapeake Bay except at Norfolk. One is greatly needed at Baltimore, and the construction of one otherwise than as proposed by this bill would cost the Government in the neighborhood of a million of dollars. This will cost the Government only the value of these three acres of land.

The whole matter has been referred to General Sherman, and he approves it; to the Secretary of War, and he recommends the passage of the bill. The bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, by that committee unanimously reported to the Senate, and it was unanimously passed by that body. It now comes here with a unanimous report of the Commerce Committee of this House, recommending its passage with a mere formal amendment. The measure is undoubtedly of much importance to the Government, the dock is needed, and better terms could not be asked for.

Mr. FORT. This bill should go to the Calendar, like other bills of similar character.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is a Senate bill which the gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to report for consideration at this time from the Committee on Commerce. The bill, together with the amendment proposed by that committee, will be read.

Mr. EDEN. I ask the gentleman from West Virginia what these three acres of land are worth?

Mr. BURCHARD. I have no objection to the immediate consideration of the bill; but I do object to its being open for discussion.

Mr. KENNA. I do not propose to open it for discussion. I shall ask to have it put on its passage at once if its consideration is not objected to.

Mr. LATHROP. What is this land worth now?

Mr. KENNA. I do not know. The only evidence we have on that subject is that it cost originally something like $3,000. The Secretary of War and other officials whose statements are in the report, and who ought to know what this land is worth and what the use of the dry-dock will be worth to the Government, recommend the passage of the bill. It is considered that the use of the dry-dock will be more valuable to the Government than the land.

Mr. FORT. I insist that this bill should go to the Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill, with the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce, was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill at this time?

Mr. FORT. I have no objection to considering it on the Calendar where we can move amendments. I have made that statement several times.

Mr. KENNA. It was not my purpose to cut off amendment or discussion; but other gentlemen were urging me to have the bill disposed of as quickly as possible with a view to saving time for the regular business of this evening.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill at this time?

Mr. O'NEILL. I must object.

Mr. FORT. I object to the consideration of the bill now, and have said so several times.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair had the misfortune not to hear the gentleman.

DRY-DOCK, ETC., AT MARE ISLAND NAVY-YARD, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. GOODE, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Naval Affairs the bill (H. R. No. 721) to appropriate money for the completion of the stone dry-dock and other public works at Mare Island navy-yard, California; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DRY-DOCK AT LEAGUE ISLAND, PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. GOODE also, by unanimous consent, reported back from the same committee, the resolution of the House of February 14, 1878, directing the committee to inquire into the expediency of erecting a dry-dock at League Island station, Philadelphia; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURCHARD. I must insist that in all these cases the motion to reconsider shall be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will see that the matter is so journalized in every case.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to inquire whether the Committee on Appropriations is understood to be instructed by the House in making these references?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly not. The matters are merely referred to that committee.

EMPLOYÉS UNDER THE LATE DOORKEEPER.

Mr. JAMES. I ask unanimous consent to present for consideration now from the Committee on Civil Service Reform a resolution authorizing that committee to examine and report upon claims of several individuals for pay for services alleged to have been performed for the House of Representatives under employment by the late Doorkeeper.

Mr. EDEN. Let the matter go to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. DUNNELL. The Committee of Accounts should consider the question.

Mr. JAMES. Quite a number of these cases have already by resolution of the House, with the consent, as I understand, of the Committee of Accounts, been referred to our committee, who have commenced examining them. There are some additional claims of the same character which we do not at present feel authorized to examine, and we desire that all such claims shall be referred to our committee.

Mr. EDEN. I object. Let the matter go to the Committee of Accounts.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. KIDDER, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have certain remarks printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. [See Appendix.]

SIDNEY D. FLANNIGAN.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4959) granting a pension to Sidney D. Flannigan, widow of Richard Flannigan, late private Company C, Ninth Regiment Illinois Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM G. LANGFORD.

Mr. BUTLER, by unanimous consent, reported, from the Committee on the Judiciary, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2715) to restore to William G. Langford the possession of a tract of land in Idaho Territory; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURCHARD. I give notice that I shall object to any more references of bills or reports of a private nature, as that business can be done to-morrow, which is private-bill day.

JUDGMENTS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4960) for the payment of certain judgments recovered against the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM P. FERGUSON.

Mr. BUTLER, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of William P. Ferguson, for payment of debt due him from the late Charles Fox for services rendered, and to have the will of said Fox set aside; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 373) for the relief of settlers on the public lands under the pre-emption laws; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same.

SUPPLIES FURNISHED TO SIOUX INDIANS OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. STEWART, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 2642) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain the amounts due to citizens of the United States for supplies furnished to the Sioux or Dakota Indians of Minnesota subsequent to August, 1860, and prior to the massacre of August, 1862, and providing for the payment thereof; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS IN CERTAIN CASES.

Mr. RIDDLE, by unanimous consent, moved that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 4105) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase pensions in certain cases," approved June 18, 1874, in order that it may be put upon its passage at this time.

There was no objection, and the committee was discharged and the bill brought before the House.

Mr. RIDDLE. The bill is all right and I hope it will be put upon its passage at this time.

Mr. BURCHARD. I do not object if it gives rise to no discussion.

The bill, which was read, in the first section provides that an act entitled "An act to increase pensions in certain cases," approved June 18, 1874, be so amended as to extend the provisions of said act to all persons who are now, or were at the time of the passage of said act, entitled to pensions under existing laws, and who have lost an arm below the elbow, or so near the elbow, or a leg below the knee, or so near the knee, as to destroy the use of the elbow or knee-joint; and such persons shall be rated in the second class, and shall receive a pension of $24 per month.

The second section provides that the act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. RIDDLE demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RIDDLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the pending section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the number of cavalry regiments is hereby reduced to six, and the number of infantry regiments to fifteen. And the President is hereby authorized and required, on or before the 1st day of July next, or as soon thereafter as practicable, to cause these reductions to be made, by the consolidation of regiments, troops, and companies, the transfer of the enlisted men of the discontinued regiments, or otherwise, as, in his opinion, may be best calculated to enforce the provisions of this act.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a point of order on that section of the bill. I make the point of order here, although it applies to the entire new legislation of the bill, and I will state it as clearly as I may in order the Chair may get at the whole force of it. All points of order were reserved by myself, having this in view.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, makes a complete change in the organization of the Army. It reduces regiments. It reduces officers. It reduces pay—not in terms, but in allowances. It is claimed, of course, this is done under the provision of Rule 120, which provides in these words:

Nor shall any provision in any bill or amendment thereto changing existing laws be in order except such as being germane to the subject-matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures.

There is no doubt there is a change in existing laws here because the present force of the Army is that which the existing law establishes. It is claimed that because regiments are reduced, and the number of officers is reduced, and the pay is reduced, it comes under the provision of that rule. My point is this: the object of that rule is evidently restricted to a particular appropriation. It is not a matter looking to the future. It is intended to apply to the existing appropriation. The question of retrenching expenditures must be limited to the particular bill because it is not a safe direction in the future if the present bill increases expenditures upon which to rely, for another Congress in another session may differ from the indication given in this House, and therefore the rule must be held to apply to the particular bill. I claim the whole scope of that rule is that if the particular bill does not retrench expenditures then you cannot change existing laws.

As indicating such intent Rule 77 provides, among other things, each appropriation bill when reported from the committee shall in the concluding clause state the sum total of all the items contained in said bill. Let us see what this bill does provide to retrench expenditures. On page 28 the examination of the text will bear me out. In the summary there it is shown that the amount appropriated in the last bill under the present law was $25,712,500.

That is under existing law. This bill changes the law, and under the provisions of the changes adds to the appropriation, so that the present bill appropriates $26,929,671.03, or an increase by virtue of its provisions of $1,217,171.03, to say nothing of a deficiency of $800,000 that will have to be hereafter added.

Now the whole warrant for this legislation is claimed to be under the rule I have just read; and it will be stated undoubtedly by the gentleman having charge of the bill that as a whole it reduces expenditures. I call your special attention, Mr. Chairman, as an old parliamentarian, to this point.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know if we are debating the bill under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is not debating the bill. He has risen to a question of order, the discussion of which is not controlled by the five-minute rule, but is only indulged during the pleasure of the Chair.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I say again, that as a careful parliamentarian I call your attention to this point. Let me illustrate it: I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the danger of an increase of a particular appropriation bill being ruled in order simply because there is a clause or a provision which may result in reductions hereafter. Suppose that the committee reported a bill or a member on the floor offered an amendment providing for doubling the pay of every clerk in this House with a provision that two years from now one-third of the clerical force should do the work, would the Chair have any doubt in ruling that such a proposition was out of order because it did not retrench present expenditures but simply left that to the uncertainty of the future?

The rule is very strict in regard to providing for new buildings unless the amounts are fixed by law. What if the committee should report a whole series of new buildings, with a clause that in the years to come so much rent should be saved, and should provide with every guarantee in the world that it should be saved, the Chair would rule that under Rule 120 and under Rule 77 he must look to the bill alone, and that if it did not retrench expenditures he must rule it out of order, being bound by the bill before him.

I do not urge this point as a technicality. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] may argue that the point of order is not well taken, on the ground that in the end this will decrease expenditures. But my point is this, that he has been obliged so to frame his bill, reducing regiments, reducing officers, and reducing pay, that the provision for the retiring pay increases the expenditures of the present year. I say that is fraught with danger which no man can see more plainly than the present occupant of the chair. The operation of the rule is intended to be limited to the particular appropriation bill. I repeat that as the cardinal point upon which I rest my objection. We cannot go into the realm of the conjectural future.

Does this bill, does this new legislation upon which I make my point retrench expenditures? Or is there inseparably connected with it an increase of expenditures by virtue of its provisions, so that the Treasury is burdened more rather than less, and therefore it does not retrench expenditures?

Whether the clause is germane to the bill, being a clause for the reorganization of the Army under an appropriation bill, is another point for the Chair to rule upon. But upon this point, that it does not retrench expenditures, but plainly, palpably, undeniably does increase expenditures, I do venture to say that I rest with confidence upon the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I think it sufficient to say in reply to the gentleman from Maine that the point of order he has made has no application to the section under consideration, and I propose to deal with his point of order when we reach a clause where it may be properly made.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to speak further on the point of order?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I would like to have the decision of the Chair, whether he is called upon to decide at this point the question of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Maine to make the point of order that the second section of this bill——

Mr. HALE. I stated that I am obliged to make the point of order now, because, although the new legislation is divided and subdivided into sections, yet it is clearly one subject-matter which the gentleman from New York has chosen to divide in that way. I am obliged to make it now because I do not want to make it on the question of the pay. I make it now so as to cover the whole question of the change of law; and I should suppose the gentleman from New York would desire that one ruling should cover all. If the Chair decides he must give a ruling narrowly on one section, which will apply to that section only, I think he will leave the matter in the condition in which the gentleman from New York would not like to have it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. On the contrary, if the decision is made at the particular point where the question of order applies the House will probably be relieved of some of its difficulties. I want the question to be raised and the decision to be given at the point where an increase of expenditures is involved in the section. An increase of expenditures is not involved in this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from New York what is the number of cavalry regiments now provided for by law?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. This bill reduces the number of cavalry regiments from ten to six. It also reduces the number of infantry regiments to sixteen, which is a reduction, not an increase of expenses.

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman claim that this is a reduction of expenditures?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will deal with the points of order which the gentleman makes under the rules, section by section and clause by clause.

Mr. HALE. Then the gentleman takes the responsibility of my making points of order as to the technicalities and possibilities of this section, and prefers that I make the point of order upon all the sections.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. You can make your points of order when the clauses come up.

Mr. HALE. I make the point of order upon this clause and I shall continue to make it upon all the clauses of the bill.

Mr. BURCHARD. The ruling under the rule under consideration, by Speaker Kerr, if my recollection is correct, was that the proposition itself must, upon its face, show that it would be an economical measure. Now, if you read this clause by itself, as was suggested by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] what does it propose? Simply that the regiments shall be reduced by consolidating the number and by putting all the men in the Army into a fewer number of regiments; but there is nothing to show that that would reduce the expenses for the officers.

Mr. EDEN. Does not that largely reduce the number of officers?

Mr. BURCHARD. Not necessarily; there is no provision here for dispensing with the services of any officer or of any man, but simply that the regiments shall be consolidated into six regiments of cavalry and sixteen regiments of infantry. It changes the law and I think that the point of order made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] is well taken.

Mr. HALE. Did not the present occupant of the chair rule in the Forty-fourth Congress, when the Indian appropriation bill was under consideration, and when the transfer of the Indian department to the War Department was proposed, that he could only look to the present bill, without regard to the future? That is my recollection, and that was the ruling of the present incumbent of the chair. I remember very well Speaker Kerr's ruling upon this question, and I think I am equally correct as to the ruling of the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. ATKINS. A regiment is a specific organization. It has so many officers; no more, no less. Then when you propose to reduce the number of regiments from twenty to sixteen, as a matter of course you reduce the number of officers just in proportion as you reduce the number of regiments.

Mr. HALE. Then why does not the bill provide for a reduction of the number of officers in proportion to the reduction of the regiments?

Mr. ATKINS. We have not yet reached that part of the bill. When we reach it I think we shall show the gentleman that it is in the interest of economy.

Mr. HALE. You will have hard work to show that.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair was called upon to decide a point of order on the Indian appropriation bill at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, and in that decision it was held that in construing Rule 120 the Chair would not resort to evidence aliunde, or to speculation or argument, but would limit his inquiries to the face of the bill, to the specific terms of the section in question, the law of the land, and the parliamentary rules and practices of this House, in determining whether a section or clause is germane or whether it retrenches expenditures or not. If it appears upon the face of the bill, or of that provision of the bill on which the point of order is made, that it retrenches expenditures, then the Chair will hold the provision to be in order. The Chair also held that the abolition of an office is prima facie evidence of a reduction of expenditures, because it is evident that if an office is dispensed with the expenses would be reduced, for no appropriation would be required for that office.

Mr. HALE. Nothing is said about offices in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair assumes that a regiment consists of a certain number of officers and men, more or less, and that the expense of supporting sixteen regiments would be less than that of supporting twenty.

Mr. HALE. The text of the section does not show that.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no appropriation in this section, and the Chair assumes that it would cost the Government less to support sixteen regiments than it would to support twenty.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the Chair decide that this appropriation is in the line of economy?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that upon the face of the section it retrenches expenditures by reducing the number of regiments in the service.

Mr. HALE. Does the Chair decide that the section is germane to the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that it is.

Mr. HALE. I now wish the decision of the Chair upon the second point that I made about the amendment being germane. I wish to say here that I am very sorry the gentleman from New York has departed from what in his opening remarks he held out to us that we should treat this bill as one entire matter. I am sorry that he restricts the point of order to this particular clause, because I was proceeding upon the idea that he had held up to us, that all these sections were for the same purpose.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman state when I said that?

Mr. HALE. There is no difficulty about that, either as a matter of memory or by examining the RECORD.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I think there would be considerable difficulty.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the point of order raised by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] that this section is not germane to the bill, the Chair is of the opinion that in a bill appropriating money for the support of the Army it is certainly germane to fix the number of regiments for the support of which appropriations should be made.

Mr. HALE. So that the Chair, upon this section, overrules the point of order that it is not germane?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the section is germane and that it also retrenches expenditures.

Mr. HALE. And the Chair would make the same ruling upon the same points of order if made to the other sections?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will reserve his decision upon the other sections until they are reached and questions of order are raised thereon.

Mr. HALE. Then the motion will be made to strike out this section.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. In order to perfect the section I move in line 2 to strike out "six" and insert "eight," as the number of cavalry regiments; and in line 3 to strike out "fifteen" and insert "eighteen," as the number of infantry regiments.

I desire to make a brief statement, and I hope I will have the attention of members of this committee. When the Committee on Appropriations instructed me to report this bill, it was upon the idea that it would carry out the wish of a majority of this House. It appears, however, since we have got into Committee of the Whole, that the number of men provided for in this bill for the Army is not acceptable to the House, and they have directed that the number shall be increased to twenty-five thousand. Whether or not that decision of this Committee of the Whole will be sustained on the vote which is to be taken in the House I do not know. I trust it will not be. I am myself satisfied that the number of men proposed in the bill as reported to the House from the Committee on Appropriations will be fully adequate to the wants of the Army.

But I have a duty to perform here, which is to make this bill conform to the expressed will of the Committee of the Whole. That will provides for an Army of twenty-five thousand men. The number of regiments provided for in section 2 of this bill, as reported from the Committee on Appropriations, that is, six regiments of cavalry and fifteen regiments of infantry, will be too small a number for the twenty-five thousand men which has been resolved upon. I therefore have moved these amendments, and trust they will be accepted by this committee.

I shall continue for the rest of the bill to offer amendments which will make the organization of the Army conform to the number of regiments which I now propose to have included in this section. I reserve, however, the right, when we get back into the House, if the Committee on Appropriations shall be sustained in their original view that twenty thousand men is sufficient for the Army, to ask to have the bill recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations, in order that it may be made to conform to that number. I am extremely anxious, as I think every gentleman here must be, to save time in the consideration of this bill. I think it will save time to make the bill conform in Committee of the Whole to the expressed will of the majority of that committee. If I can have the aid of those gentlemen who can throw aside partisan feeling and will endeavor to effect economy, then if we cannot have all that would be secured by the original bill, I shall consider that half a loaf is better than no bread.

I am sure that in that event we will be able to make a bill which, if it is not entirely acceptable to either side of the House, will give us a most efficient Army with a saving of $2,000,000 per annum. And I ask the co-operation of the Committee of the Whole in that direction.

Mr. HALE. I fear that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] in his apparent yielding to the will of this committee is disingenuous. He says that he wants to make this bill conform to the will of the Committee of the Whole. The bill as originally reported from the Committee on Appropriations provided for twenty-six regiments. The Committee of the Whole has already voted upon the subject of the rank and file of the Army, and has decided to keep the number at twenty-five thousand, as the present law requires.

Now the evident meaning of that vote of the Committee of the Whole is that the House is well enough satisfied with the Army as it is. And if the gentleman from New York wishes to square his conduct to the implied wish of the Committee of the Whole, then let him move to strike out the whole of this section and leave the organization of the Army as it now is.

Instead of that, however, he says that he wishes to conform to the will of the Committee of the Whole by compromises, by providing for thirty-two regiments instead of forty regiments as at present. And he does not even stop there in his magnanimity, but throws out to us the intimation that he does not even concede that the Committee of the Whole has settled the matter of the number of the rank and file, and that in the House he will demand a vote upon the proposition to leave the Army as at present with twenty-five thousand; and if that proposition is not sustained, then he will further ask that the number of regiments be cut down from thirty-two, to which he now agrees, to twenty-six as originally reported from the Committee on Appropriations.

Now let the gentleman stand upon his original proposition of twenty-six regiments and twenty thousand men. The House has taken the bill as it has come to us thus far and have voted upon it so far as we have proceeded. Let the gentleman stand by his bill as originally reported, or let him yield to the implied wish of the House that the Army shall remain as it is.

As the gentleman has taken occasion to appeal to the patriotism of members here rather than to their partisanship, let me appeal to those gentlemen who have thus far stood firm in maintaining the Army as it is and not reducing it from its present proportion, to maintain that attitude and this Committee of the Whole will send the bill through with the Army containing the number of rank and file which the law now provides, and with the regimental organization provided by law not diminished; so that one section of the country will not be obliged to have less for its protection than it now has. Let them stand by their past action and make this one whole.

In other words, if there has been anything like consistency or principle in the fight that has been made here, let us carry it through and not be deviated from our course by the insidious proposition of the gentleman from New York, who does not even admit that if his compromise is taken he will agree to it when we come into the House.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I know no member of this House who can as little afford to charge another member with being disingenuous as the gentleman from Maine. I can point to his course in this House from the beginning of this session, and wherever there was a chance to do some narrow, indirect, roundabout thing, it has always come from the gentleman from Maine. Yet he comes up here and charges me, who in perfect frankness have stated my purposes to the House, with being disingenuous!

We have taken the vote of the Committee of the Whole upon the question whether there shall be twenty-five thousand or twenty thousand five hundred men in our Army. That question has been decided, and I will try to conform the provisions of this bill to that decision. We have never had any vote in this Committee of the Whole as to whether there shall be twenty-six or thirty or forty regiments. I propose to take that vote now; and when the vote has been taken and the question decided, I propose to conform the provisions of the bill to the vote of the committee. All such appeals as that which the gentleman from Maine makes will be in vain with those who really desire to legislate for the interests of the country.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, a disingenuous course is a course which comes out where one leasts expects. I am willing to submit to the judgment of the House my course, as to whether I have come out at the place I seemed to be aiming at, as compared with the course of the gentleman from New York as to whether he in legislation comes out where he is seemingly aiming at.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I feel it my duty as a member of this House to object to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. I do not believe that it is the will of the majority of the members of this House that this bill shall be subjected to any such amendments. When I look around me and see these empty seats, I am satisfied that it is "absenteeism" which is causing this extravagant legislation.

A MEMBER. "Absenteeism" on which side?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. On the democratic side. I find more vacant seats here among members who are in favor of a reduction of the Army than among those who are in favor of this extravagant legislation. I regard this as an important bill, and I believe that the people all over the country are looking to us for retrenchment in the Army as well as in every other department of the Government. For this reason I protest against this House acting upon such an important question as this with all these empty seats, and I give notice now (for I believe there is not a quorum here to-night) that if the vote should develop that fact, I shall move a call of the House. If members will not come here voluntarily and discharge their duty, I am in favor of bringing them here by the aid of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend by striking out the pending section. It is evident the Committee of the Whole is impatient for a vote, and I will occupy but a moment. If the motion of the gentleman from New York is voted down, then I will press this motion to strike out the section. I make this motion the more readily because we have in this bill, and expect to retain, a proposition to refer the whole question to a commission of major-generals, to report to us next December. It has always seemed to me, in committee and out of committee, that this was the wisest course to pursue. According to this bill we now legislate out of existence fourteen regiments and at the same time we provide for a commission to report in December, which commission may make a report, that Congress may adopt, in favor of restoring all these regiments. Undoubtedly it is safe to say that the commission will not in all respects agree to the legislation of this House.

While I do not know, and do not pretend to know, much about the Army—and what little I do know I have learned within the last few days, [laughter]—I believe some reorganization of the Army is necessary. Yet I could not safely set up my judgment as to what this reorganization ought to be, nor do I believe any member of this House dare say that his notion about such reorganization is certainly correct. As we propose to provide for this commission let the whole question go to the commission. While I believe some reorganization ought to take place, it seems to me this is the safer and wiser course.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HEWITT, of New York, there were—ayes 86, noes 93.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HEWITT, of New York, and Mr. FOSTER were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 97, noes 75.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. FOSTER, to strike out the section.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 95, noes 100.

Mr. HALE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HEWITT, of New York, and Mr. FOSTER were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 90.

So the motion of Mr. FOSTER was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That hereafter each company of cavalry shall consist of one captain, one first lieutenant, two second lieutenants, one first sergeant, five sergeants, four corporals, two trumpeters, two farriers, one saddler, and such number of privates, not exceeding one hundred, as the President may direct.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move to amend by striking out "one hundred" and inserting "one hundred and twenty-five;" so that the last clause of the section will read: "and such number of privates, not exceeding one hundred and twenty-five, as the President may direct."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That hereafter the Adjutant-General's department shall consist of one Adjutant-General with the rank and pay of colonel, two assistant adjutants-general with the rank and pay of lieutenant-colonel, and two assistant adjutants-general with the rank and pay of major. And the President is hereby authorized to detail, from the captains and first lieutenants of the Army, such number, not exceeding ten, as he may deem necessary, to serve as assistant adjutants-general, who shall have, while so serving, the rank and pay of captain of cavalry: Provided, That five of the present force, over and above the number authorized in this section, shall be retained until the 1st day of July, 1879, and the detail of five of the number proposed to be detailed in this section shall be deferred until the same date. Vacancies in the grade of major in said department shall be filled by selection from the officers who shall have been detailed to duty therein pursuant to the provisions of this act.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend by striking out this section, and I will follow this with a motion to strike out the two or three succeeding sections. My reason for this proposition, which I think will meet the concurrence of both sides of the House, is that while in this bill we undertake to deal with a portion of the staff, there is a large portion which we do not undertake to deal with at all. We have referred all staff departments to a board in section 12. I propose to strike out sections 7, 8, and 9, and to refer the whole of these corps in the same way.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the same motion will be made in regard to sections 8, 9, 10, and 11, and I reserve the right to a yea-and-nay vote on each section in the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I hope the motion to strike out this section will prevail. I will briefly state the history of this Adjutant-General's department.

Under the act approved June 18, 1846, providing for the prosecution of the war with Mexico, the President was authorized to appoint four assistant adjutants-general, making the number of officers in the Adjutant-General's department eleven.

The act of March 3, 1847, authorized the appointment of three assistant adjutants-general, making the number of officers in the department fourteen.

This continued to be the strength of the department until the act of August 3, 1861, which increased the number of officers to twenty.

The act of March 3, 1869, prohibited promotions and appointments in this department; and the act of March 3, 1873, authorized the appointment of one assistant adjutant-general.

The legal strength of the department at this time was twenty, but the order prohibiting promotions and appointments reduced the number in service to sixteen.

The act of March, 1875, directs that the Adjutant-General's department shall consist of seventeen officers, the present legal strength of the department.

It will be observed from the foregoing that there have not been less than fourteen officers in the Adjutant-General's department since the act of March 3, 1847.

Section 7 of the pending bill reduces the number of officers in the Adjutant-General's Office from seventeen to five, and provides for the detail of ten company officers to replace the twelve discharged therefrom. The period of service of the twelve officers of the Adjutant-General's department to be discharged ranges from seventeen to forty years. Seven officers of the department are made supernumerary July 1, 1878, five July 1, 1879, and the present Adjutant-General is vacated by casualty. The average period of service in the Adjutant-General's department is twenty-six years, the average in the line of the Army ten and a half, and in the staff fifteen and a half. It is now proposed to replace these experienced officers with a lot of new officers who have seen no service in the department. Every one knows the perfect organization of an army depends in a great degree on the skill and experience of the officers in the adjutant-general's department.

I am sure we will commit a great fault if we send these men into private life. Many of them have commanded corps in the Army during the late war. If this reduction is made it will send out of the Army such experienced and useful officers as are embraced in the following statement. Can the service spare these officers?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to have taken any part in this debate, preferring to adopt the views of the committee who reported the bill to the House and trust to their judgment; but the discussion has taken so wide a range and so many opinions have found expression that I desire to place on record the views which shall control my vote.

The principle involved underlies the whole structure of our republican Government, though the question is simply whether the Army shall consist of twenty or twenty-five thousand men.

What have we to protect, sir, but the frontier settlements, and what to defend but our Texan border. The General of the Army himself believes the smaller number to be sufficient for our border protection, and I fail to find any reason why I should vote for its increase. Sir, we must ask ourselves this question and find its answer in our votes: is our Army to be such that in every outbreak which may occur in any State the Army of the United States is to be brought into requisition?

Sir, have we reached this point in our history that republican institutions can only be successfully guarded by military force furnished by the General Government?

Sir, I know that in the viewless air already have been heard the mutterings of discontent, and that in the near future we may expect a greater strain upon our free institutions and the public safety than we have ever had.

Ah, sir, could we but witness a tithe of the distress which prevails throughout the land we would not wonder that the spirit of a real discontent has some reason for its existence, when willing hands and honest hearts are found by tens of thousands wandering through the land asking only for work that their families may find relief from starvation.

Sir, it was but a few days since a laborer from my own State walked the greater part of the distance here to find employment, and I applied in vain to several of the Departments to beg employment for him. What a commentary is this on the condition of our country, and how false are we that we do not do something to relieve it and set the wheels of busy industry in motion by early, prompt action which shall give settlement to the questions of finance and of the tariff!

This is all our present trouble. You threaten so often to change your financial system and so often to disturb the duties on imports that capital, tired of waiting for investment, seeks a home elsewhere, and your industries languish and labor meets not its reward, and ruin and distress find prevalence.

Sir, there have been many arguments used in this debate as to why the Army should be increased, and the spread of communistic doctrines is alleged. Will an Army of twenty-five or fifty or two hundred and fifty thousand men cure this and give to our people assurance of safety that their slumbers may be undisturbed? Chain the lightning if you can, but attempt not to smother the cries of woe and of distress which are everywhere heard No, sir, we want no standing Army for a nation of freemen. If they are so derelict to their own duty, so unable to cope with the ills which society at times must suffer, then you may call in vain your armies to the field of strife. For seven long and weary months we have discussed these questions. All have sympathy, all seek to catch the popular ear, and all to touch the popular heart; but language can find no remedy nor find a shelter for the homeless wanderer. You must enact into law the measures for his prompt relief, and seek by the laws of human kindness and of public confidence to win capital from its lurking places that it may find harmony with labor and give the nation thrift. The evil under which we labor is that not of overproduction alone, but of overlegislation. The best of governments is that which governs least, not by armies, but by general laws but seldom disturbed and a well-defined and settled policy of government.

Mr. Chairman, I have reason to know whereof I speak. New Jersey in all her action is conservative. The spirit which controls my people is not born of revolution. In the trying times of the past year, when the spirit of disorder was rife throughout the land, we sought not the strong arm of Government but the kindly counsels of conservative men, and by them all danger was disarmed. To have invoked the Army to our midst would have invoked disorder and disaster. The faithful, energetic action of one man above all others who had won his own way from hard-earned toil to a position of high trust, George W. Barker, by his sympathy with labor and his devotion to its interest for many years, was of more avail than would have been ten regiments of armed men, and my city gave to him an ovation of which a conqueror might be proud. He had conquered, but it was a conquest of the heart. Freemen want not bullets but arguments, not monopolied power but the spirit of kindness and a generous devotion to their interests on the part of legislation.

England, with her standing army of one hundred and forty thousand; France, to whom our attention is so often of late directed, with her army of nearly half a million of bayonets. Germany, the land of poetry and song, with her army of over four hundred thousand, give not as great security to their people as does our Government with but twenty thousand, relying rather upon the intelligence and virtue of our people. The States must of themselves afford their own protection and correct the evils which may exist.

The preservation of the public peace and the endurance of American liberty will find their best vindication, not from the American bayonet, but much the rather from the American ballot, which—

> As snow-flakes fall upon the sod;
> But executes a freeman's will,
> As lightning does the will of God.

Withdraw your armies from the States; invite your people to a more watchful devotion to their political interests. It is only where the waves of the great ocean of public sentiment are lashed into fury at our presidential elections that they emerge from their fancied security to exercise the highest privilege they of all nations do enjoy. If the spirit of distrust now awakened throughout the land will do this we shall have but little reason to regret its present existence. America is to Europe what Western was not long since to Eastern Europe—the land of adventure and of free opinions. Be it ours by our devotion to the simple principles of republican government to prove ourselves worthy of the high trust which God has given us, and the waves of discord and of strife will wash in vain upon the shores of earth's great Republic.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the motion to strike out the seventh section.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 104, noes 85.

Mr. ATKINS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ATKINS and Mr. FOSTER were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 94, noes 79.

So the motion was agreed to, and section 7 was stricken out.

The Clerk read section 8, as follows:

SEC. 8. That hereafter the Inspector General's department shall consist of one Inspector-General with the rank and pay of colonel, and two assistant inspectors-general with the rank and pay of lieutenant-colonel. And the President is hereby authorized to detail, from officers of the Army not below the rank of major, such number, not exceeding one for each military geographical division and department, as he may deem necessary, to serve as assistant inspectors-general. Vacancies in the grade of lieutenant-colonel in said department shall be filled by selection from the officers who shall have been detailed to duty therein pursuant to the provisions of this act.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to strike out that section.

Mr. ATKINS. I move the committee rise. I am not willing to see the bill go on to-night in this way.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman having charge of the bill asked for an evening session, and we have only been here a short time.

Mr. ATKINS. We cannot finish the bill to-night. The gentleman's object is to finish it his own way.

Mr. FINLEY. I call the gentleman to order, as the motion to rise is not debatable.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 100.

Mr. BLACKBURN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ATKINS and Mr. FOSTER were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 85, noes 90.

So the committee refused to rise.

The question then recurred on the motion to strike out section 8.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 95, noes 87.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I shall reserve the right to demand the yeas and nays on this amendment in the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I demand tellers on striking out section 8.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HEWITT, of New York, and Mr. FOSTER were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 32.

Several MEMBERS. No quorum!

Mr. WILSON. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia moves that the committee rise.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to know what is the pleasure of the gentleman having charge of this bill in regard to proceeding with it to-night. I came here to transact business; but if the bill is not to be proceeded with further to-night the committee may as well rise.

Mr. YEATES. Under the rules the committee is bound to rise when it finds itself without a quorum.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. There is evidently a quorum in the Hall.

Mr. HOOKER. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not entertain any motion until order is restored.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read Rule 106.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask the Chair to permit me to submit a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HOOKER. My point of order is that there being no quorum the committee is bound to rise that the chairman may report the fact to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read Rule 106.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or the Committee of the Whole House, finds itself without a quorum, the chairman shall cause the roll of the House to be called, and thereupon the committee shall rise, and the chairman shall report the names of the absentees to the House, which shall be entered on the Journal.—Rule 106. And as soon (after rising for such purpose) as a quorum is ascertained to be present, the House must return into committee.—Journal, 2, 27, page 282.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state there is evidently a quorum within the Hall, and if the tellers will resume their places and gentlemen will vote that fact will appear. Otherwise the Chair will instruct the Clerk to call the roll. Is there objection to the tellers again taking their places?

Mr. HOOKER and others objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BANKS. I call upon the Chairman to count the committee and ascertain whether there is a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule requires that the roll shall be called.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Acklen,	Danford,	Lockwood,	Siemons,
Aiken,	Denison,	Loring,	Smith, A. Herr
Banning,	Douglas,	Luttrell,	Starin,
Beebe,	Durham,	Martin,	Stephens,
Benedict,	Dwight,	McGowan,	Swann,
Bicknell,	Ellis,	Metcalfe,	Thompson,
Bland,	Forney,	Money,	Thornburgh,
Bliss,	Garfield,	Patterson, T. M.	Townsend, M. I.
Bragg,	Gause,	Peddie,	Turner,
Bridges,	Gibson,	Potter,	Waddell,
Bundy,	Glover,	Pound,	Walker,
Cabell,	Gunter,	Powers,	Wigginton,
Cain,	Hart,	Price,	Williams, James
Camp,	Hartridge,	Pugh,	Williams, Richard
Caswell,	Hazelton,	Quinn,	Willis, Albert S.
Chittenden,	Hendee,	Rainey,	Willis Benj. A.
Claflin,	Hiscock,	Robbins,	Wood,
Clark, Alvah A.	House,	Roberts,	Wren,
Clarke of Kentucky,	Jones, Frank	Robertson,	Wright.
Conger,	Kelley,	Robinson, G. D.
Cox, Samuel S.	Killinger,	Robinson, M. S.
Cravens,	Knapp,	Ross,

The committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House having found itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, and now reported the names of the absentees to the House.

Mr. YEATES. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No motion is in order. The Committee of the Whole having found itself without a quorum, and the chairman having caused the roll to be called, and reported the names of the absentees to the House, the call of the roll has developed the presence of a quorum, 206 gentlemen having answered to their names. The House returns into committee, and the gentleman from Illinois will resume the chair.

The House accordingly returned into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BUTLER. I make the point that that motion is not in order. The committee, when it was found without a quorum, was dividing, and the tellers should now resume their places.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The committee was in the midst of a division, and the tellers will resume their places. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] to strike out the eighth section of the bill.

The tellers, Mr. HEWITT, of New York, and Mr. FOSTER, resumed their places.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 93, noes 79.

So the motion to strike out the eighth section was agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move that the committee rise.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 98, noes 103.

Several members called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FOSTER, and Mr. HEWITT of New York, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 96, noes 93.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4867) for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before the question is put on the motion to adjourn, the Chair, if there be no objection, will submit certain requests.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PEDDIE, for four days, on account of important business;

To Mr. ROBBINS, for four days; and

To Mr. DAVIDSON, for one day.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BLISS, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw papers in the case of Jeremiah Phelan, there being no adverse report thereon.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. TIPTON, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD as part of the debates some remarks on the tariff. [See Appendix.]

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 4549) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the post-office appropriation bill, which has been returned from the Senate with amendments, that the bill may be printed with the amendments of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is that gentlemen shall be in order.

Mr. HOOKER. I move that the House do now adjourn, and I know that that motion is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion has already been made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. HOOKER. I withdraw my objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.]

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. BLOUNT, the bill (H. R. No. 4246) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, returned from the Senate with amendments, was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and, with the Senate amendments, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOOKER. I now insist upon my motion that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is already pending as made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.]

The question was put on Mr. HEWITT's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 98, noes 72.

Mr. HALE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 96, nays 77, not voting 118; as follows:

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 24, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CORRECTION OF A DATE.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to make a statement in relation to the printing of a public document "Forty-fifth Congress, second session, Executive Document No. 80," where a date has been misprinted. It is a telegram received by Dr. Linderman, and is printed "May 1, 1877." I have the original telegram in my hand and it is November 1, 1877, which makes all the difference in the world in the construction of it. It seems to have been in cipher, and reads as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA, November 1, 1877.

To H. R. LINDERMAN, Director of Mint, Washington:

Recent instructions forcing all bark into George for hammer for China trade Jamaica unless determined to give Giles entire control of bullion business garnish should be opened for deposits for hawk.

HARRIS.

I merely desire to make the correction in the date as it is a matter of some importance to the parties.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from Commander George Dewey, United States Navy, and naval secretary of the Light-House Board, calling the attention of the Committee on Commerce to the fact that the act of June 23, 1874, extending the jurisdiction of that board over the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio Rivers does not contain any provision for the enforcement of the lighting of a bridge owned or operated by an independent corporation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, recommending an additional appropriation of $10,529.49 for the purchase of the site for the Ringgold Barracks, in the State of Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WHYTE. I present the memorial of Alexander Brown & Sons, Thomas Whitridge & Co., Robert A. Fisher & Co., W. W. Spence, Hugh Jenkins & Co., Spence, Montague & Co., and other merchants and citizens of Baltimore, Maryland, remonstrating against the proposed subsidy to a line of steamships from the United States to Brazil; and, as it is a very short memorial, I ask that it be read and then laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be read in the absence of objection.

The memorial was ordered to lie on the table, and was read as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned merchants of Baltimore, engaged in trade between this port and Brazil, would respectfully and earnestly remonstrate against the passage of the bill now pending before the Senate to provide for the establishment of steamship mail service between the United States and Brazil, and any similar bill granting subsidies to steamship lines between New York and Brazil and New Orleans and Brazil.

The statement in the report of the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, No. 338, that "the passage of a steamer direct from the United States to Brazil is now unknown," is erroneous. The Merchants' line, consisting of the steamships Cassine, Glencannox, and Glenlogan, have been plying regularly between New York and Brazil for more than a year past, carrying the mails at a cost to the Government of one-third of the ocean postage, being a little more than $1,200 per annum, since the expiration of the subsidy to the Garrison line. Cable communication has been perfected with Brazil, and almost all the business between the two countries has been transacted by wire, making the mails of comparatively little value except for the transmission of confirmatory advices and accounts. There are now some twenty firms engaged in this trade in Baltimore, the oldest of which has been in existence more than fifty years. There are thirty-two sailing-vessels plying regularly between Baltimore and Brazil, all of which were built in this country, are owned by American citizens, exporting American produce, and carrying the American flag, some of which have made the voyage between the ports of Baltimore and Rio de Janeiro in the short space of twenty-six days, while it is expected that the proposed steamship lines will make the voyage in twenty-five days, a difference scarcely appreciable.

In addition to these facts, which we think show how unnecessary these particular subsidies are, we suggest that such special legislation is unfair and unjust, tending to build up one interest at the expense of others.

Mr. THURMAN. I have been requested to present the petition of Charles E. Gorman and 1,100 others, praying for the passage of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. They are citizens of the State of Rhode Island, I suppose mainly naturalized citizens, who are not allowed to vote in that State unless they possess a freehold, and they pray for an additional amendment to the Constitution in these words:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of the place of nativity of any citizen thereof.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

As this petition relates to a very important subject and is brief, and in very respectful language, I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio desires the petition to be read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned citizens of the United States, residing within the State of Rhode Island, would respectfully show to your honorable bodies that, owing to the peculiar provisions of the constitution of the State of Rhode Island, nearly one-third of her population, despite the fact that full power over the subject of naturalization is exclusively vested in Congress by the Constitution of the United States, and every act required to become a citizen of the United States, and by their residence in this State citizens of Rhode Island, has been complied with by our citizens of foreign birth, are, unless they are possessed of a freehold, not required, in the case of native citizens, wholly deprived of the right of suffrage and of participation in any political election for Representatives in Congress and presidential electors, as well as for State officers and members of the General Assembly, by whom Senators in Congress are chosen. By means thereof, the naturalization laws of the United States are, within the State of Rhode Island, nullified, and the whole political powers of the State vested in the native population, while the naturalized citizens, who have renounced all claim to the protection of the country of their origin, and either are, or are entitled to be citizens of the United States, are rendered, unless in exceptional cases, utterly alien to the institutions of their adopted country.

Moreover, the effect of this disfranchisement, which exists in Rhode Island alone, and is peculiar to its constitution, is not limited to the State, but exercises its influence on the country at large through its bearing on the elections of members of both Houses of Congress and on the choice of the President and Vice-President of the United States in which the votes of naturalized citizens, in proportion to their number, are entitled to be counted in common with that of their fellow-citizens.

Your memorialists would further respectfully show that whatever might have been the objection to the intervention of the United States in matters deemed previously to our civil war exclusively of State cognizance, none can exist since the adoption of the fifteenth amendment intended for the protection of the emancipated slaves against any hostile legislation on the part of what had been the dominant race. The rights of naturalized citizens, though they have the misfortune to belong to the Caucasian race, which constitutes the white population of the United States, we submit should be not less sacred than those of persons of African origin, who enjoy the special protection of the Federal Constitution. Nor can we conceive of any reason which could be adduced in favor of according a guarantee of the political rights of the negro population of the South, which would not justify Congress from intervening in their case. All that we ask is that they should be put on the same footing as to their political rights as the emancipated slaves; and that while the fifteenth article of the Federal Constitution provides that—

"The rights of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude"—

We therefore invoke the adoption of a further amendment guaranteeing the right of naturalized citizens to vote against any exclusion on account of the place of their birth. And we therefore respectfully ask of Congress to propose to the Legislatures of the several States the following as the sixteenth article, which, when ratified by three-fourths thereof, shall become a part of the Constitution of the United States:

ARTICLE XVI.

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of the place of nativity of any citizen thereof.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

We would beg to refer in support of our prayer to the proceedings in the two Houses of Congress in connection with the passage of the fifteenth amendment and which included, as originally proposed, the provision for which we now ask.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. There were some similar petitions which I presented yesterday laid on the table. I move that they be referred to the same committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented fourteen petitions from a like number of councils of the Order of United American Merchants, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying Congress to abstain from any changes in the tariff, and setting forth that such non-action is equally for the good of capital and labor; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DORSEY presented a resolution of Council No. 9, Sovereigns of Industry, of the District of Columbia, in favor of the passage of a law providing for a coal-weigher for the District of Columbia, and requiring coal-dealers to send the certificate of such coal-weigher with each load of coal sold; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BECK presented the petition of D. Ellis Conner and others, citizens of Bath County, Kentucky, praying that a pension be granted to George Oakley and Jacob Ginter, old, infirm, and destitute soldiers of the United States in the war with Mexico, both being citizens of Bath County, Kentucky; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Perry E. Brocchus, administrator of the estate of Augustin Maurin, deceased, praying the passage of a law authorizing the payment of the amount of a draft drawn by Colonel John B. The bill (S. Mr. EDMUNDS. I give notice that I shall ask the attention of the Senate to the consideration of this bill some day I trust the next week, when there shall have been time enough for Senators to examine it carefully, as I hope all will.

Mr. THURMAN. In respect to the report made on the bill relative to the count of presidential votes, I only wish to remark that the report is not a unanimous report of the committee. I will take some occasion to explain my own reasons for dissenting from some parts of that report.

No. 2401) to authorize the claimants to certain lands in Santa Barbara County, California, to submit their claim to the United States district court for that State for adjudication, to report the same favorably with an amendment. The bill is the same as a bill passed by the Senate with the exception of the amendment which the Senate bill contains, and if it is in order I will move that the Senate take it up and pass it at this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the amendment printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects and desires to have the amendment printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was not able to attend the meeting of the committee this morning. I have no doubt the proposition is right; but if it is agreeable to the Senator I should like to have the bill go over until to-morrow.

The bill provides that his heirs shall be relieved of and from all disabilities now existing and preventing them from renewing or reviving the application by the administrator of the estate of Graham, deceased, and authorizes the administrator to renew the application, or file a new one, conforming to present rules, and authorizes the Commissioner of Patents to grant and issue letters-patent for the invention or inventions set forth in the application.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report in this case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 72) for the relief of the heirs of William A. Graham, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

A bill in substance the same as this bill passed the House of Representatives in the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, and was referred to the Senate Committee on Patents.

The following report was submitted by Mr. JOHNSTON, of Virginia, which the committee adopt as their report on this bill:

["Senate Report No. 396—Forty-fourth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 431) for the relief of the heirs of William A. Graham, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

"On November 23, 1837, William A. Graham applied for a patent for a device to extinguish fire by a combination of carbonic-acid gas and water. His specifications contained a full and complete description of the invention, but his application was refused on the 25th of the same month. On December 29, 1837, he filed amended specifications and claims, and on January 13, 1838, he requested the Department to suspend any action till further advised. On April 3, 1838, he filed in the office a third series of specifications and claims, unaccompanied, however, by any drawing or model. The records do not show that the last application was acted upon.

"On December 13, 1851, Graham again came before the Department with a model, and asked that his case be acted upon. Prior to this last date he had met with an accident which actually confined him to his bed for three years, and almost entirely disabled him. The Commissioner again rejected his application, on the ground that it was substantially the same invention originally brought forward, and he was not inclined to overrule his predecessor.

"Graham was very poor and unable to undergo the expense of an appeal, and died in 1857. He never withdrew his application or reclaimed a part of the fee paid by him, as he had a right to do, but he lived and died knowing that he had made a useful invention, and never abandoning his claim.

"The war ensued not long after the death of W. A. Graham, and after it was over it was five years before Virginia, of which Graham had been a citizen, and where his relatives mostly reside, was admitted to representation. Since then A. Graham, administrator of William A. Graham, in behalf of the heirs of the latter, has made several efforts to obtain such legislation as would enable him to go before the Commissioner of Patents, but has not yet succeeded.

"Though a patent was refused to William A. Graham, yet one was granted April 13, 1869, to P. F. Carlier and Alphonse A. C. Vegnon, two citizens of France; and upon examining the specifications filed by them they are found to claim, 'The improvement in the art of extinguishing fires by throwing upon the fire or conflagration a properly directed stream of mingled carbonic-acid gas and water, by means of the pressure or expansive force exerted by the mass of mingled gas and water from which the stream is derived'—the identical thing claimed by Graham thirty-two years previously.

"Thus a patent was granted to foreigners which had been persistently refused to a native citizen.

"That Graham was the original inventor is quite certain. His opponents concede that, for in the printed argument filed by them they say: 'The idea of using carbonic acid combined with water to extinguish fire was unquestionably original with him, and he was among the first to make the discovery,' &c.

"And the Babcock Fire-Extinguisher Company appear and file a brief, in which they use this language:

"'When they embarked in the enterprise they supposed, with good reason, that their patents covered the entire field, else they had not invested their capital in the business. They now find that Graham was the original inventor, and that his invention anticipated all others. Hence, for the purpose of saving the capital that they have invested in the business, they ask that this bill may be passed, in order that, if the patent be allowed, they may take a license under it from the heirs, and thus, while paying a royalty to them, at the same time preserve their business and the large capital invested in it. For this reason they ask the passage of the bill.'

"It will be seen that that large company not only makes no objection to Graham's application, but concedes the right of his heirs to have a rehearing before the Commissioner.

"But who was the original inventor of the fire-extinguisher by the use of carbonic acid and water has been judicially settled in the case of The Northwestern Fire-Extinguisher Company et al. vs. The Philadelphia Fire-Extinguisher Company, and the decision is published in the Patent Office Official Gazette of July 14, 1874.

"The plaintiffs claimed under the patent already mentioned, as having been originally issued in 1869 to the Frenchmen Carlier and Vegnon. The defendants insisted that the plaintiffs could take nothing under that patent, because Carlier and Vegnon were not the original inventors, but that William A. Graham was the original inventor. And the court sustained the defendants, and adjudged the patent to Carlier and Vegnon void for want of novelty in all the devices claimed, and says the reason of the examiner for rejecting Graham's application 'now seems strange enough.'

"Without quoting at length from that case, your committee refer to it as establishing the fact that Graham was the original inventor; that a patent issued to other parties was void on that account; that Graham had demonstrated by actual trial and experiment, as far back as 1852 or 1853, the efficiency of his method for extinguishing fire; and that as early as 1851 a model and drawings of the apparatus described in the specification were filed by Dr. Graham in the Patent Office. And the court says, referring to the evidence in the case, 'Against the pressure of all these proofs I cannot resist the conclusion that Dr. Graham devised an original method of extinguishing fires by the combined agency of carbonic-acid gas and water, and that he "perfected and adapted" his invention by embodying it in the form of mechanical appliances capable of operative and successful use.'

"Dr. Graham was prevented by the twofold calamities of poverty and sickness from appealing to the courts or prosecuting his case with much vigor; and your committee are of opinion that his heirs are entitled to the relief sought, and they recommend the passage of the House bill."

The decision of the committee in the case cited in the report of Mr. JOHNSTON appears to be conclusive of the originality of the invention by Graham. The invention was useful and important in a high degree. Without any fault on the part of Graham he was deprived of the whole benefit of his invention, and has never realized anything from it.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill as amended.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Patents with amendments.

The first amendment of the committee was, in line 3, before the name "William A. Graham," to strike out the words "the said."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 5, before the word "are," to insert "they;" so as to read, "and they are hereby."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 7, before the word "application," to strike out "said" and insert "an."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 8, after the words "William A. Graham, deceased," to insert "for a patent for a novel method of extinguishing fires."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 11, after the word "application," to strike out the words "or file a new one," and in the same line, after the word "conforming," to insert the words "the same."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now upon the amendment of the committee striking out the preamble.

The amendment was agreed to, and the preamble was stricken out.

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT JUDGE.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 498) to provide for the appointment of an additional circuit judge in the second judicial circuit. It is all-important that the bill should be acted upon at once and the Senators from New York are very desirous to have it done.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to add at the end of the second section:

But the clerks of the circuit courts shall be appointed by the circuit judge oldest in commission; and he shall designate, from time to time, the district or districts in which the junior circuit judge shall hold or preside in the circuit courts. And two circuit courts may be held at the same time in any district, in which case the senior circuit judge as aforesaid shall designate the business to be done by each.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I had hoped when the present Congress met that before it terminated some general measure of relief to the overcrowded dockets in the Federal courts would have been matured and passed; but it may be received as an accepted fact that no general bill will be presented at this session for the action of the body. It becomes necessary, therefore, to inquire whether in certain localities there is not an absolute necessity for additional judicial force. The city of New York is the metropolis of the country, and we have been pressed by the entire bar of the second circuit upon this subject more than by any other locality in the United States. I believe that public justice requires that an additional circuit judge should be appointed for that circuit. I believe that it is more necessary there than in any other locality in this country, with the single exception of the Chicago circuit. It is a denial of justice in New York to intrust the disposition of the entire business that accumulates in the circuit court there to one judge. I have no reliable statistics of the entire number of cases, common law, chancery, admiralty, and criminal cases, that are upon the dockets in the city of New York, nor are those statistics necessary in order to the solution of the question whether or not this additional judge should be provided. The most accurate way of judging upon that subject is to ascertain the number of causes that are put upon the calendar for trial at a given term, at the present term, for instance, the April term of that court. Those causes are put upon the calendar by one of the counsel on notice to the adverse party and to the clerk. They are ready for trial; issues have been joined in them. Very many cases are, of course, upon the dockets which will ultimately be disposed of without troubling the court, being dropped in some manner. Then there are a great many other cases in which testimony is being taken and the issues prepared that will go upon the calendar at some future time.

I have reliable statistics of the calendar of the present April term of that court, which is now in session. There were four hundred and forty-four jury cases set down for hearing; thirty-three only of those cases have been so far disposed of. There were one hundred and sixteen cases put upon the equity calendar; only five of those cases have been disposed of; seven demurrers at law of importance; none of those have been disposed of; five motions for trial in the thirty-three cases that have been heard; none of those have been disposed of; fifty-nine appeals in admiralty; none have been disposed of; five reviews in bankruptcy; none have been disposed of; seven writs of error from the district court; none have been disposed of; forty motions; eighteen disposed of. When I say "disposed of," I mean heard by the court. In many of them the decisions have not been announced, the court is preparing the decisions; but they have been heard by the court, and therefore are treated as disposed of. The oldest jury issue undisposed of is October 3, 1865. The oldest admiralty appeal there is November 12, 1870. The oldest writ of error undisposed of is November 1, 1876. The oldest equity issue is November 25, 1869. There are three cases of equity appeals undisposed of arising in 1870; one in 1871; one in 1872; two in 1873; five in 1874; eighteen in 1875; forty-two in 1876; and thirty-three in 1877.

Time is waning, and therefore I do not wish to discuss this subject any further. I believe it is a denial of justice to suitors to withhold this measure of relief. We are bound to furnish all the needed judicial force to dispose of this business.

Mr. VOORHEES. I wish to say one word in regard to the increase of judges in certain States. I have not a doubt that it is necessary in this case, and it is equally necessary in many other States. It is eminently necessary in my own State. What the Senator from Illinois has said in regard to the denial of justice in New York is eminently true in Indiana. I know business depending in the circuit court of the United States in Indiana that, for the want of a circuit judge to transact the duties of that position, has been continued, not from month to month, but from year to year, until suitors against insurance companies and in cases of that kind have been driven to compromise away their rights because there was a denial of justice. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I am ready to vote for a general system to increase the number of judges where an increase is needed. I shall not vote for any isolated case.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, (to Mr. VOORHEES.) There is a bill reported from the committee for a new circuit judge in your circuit.

Mr. VOORHEES. Very well, but that would not meet the objection that I make. It would not be right for me to say that if I had what I wanted to have, other Senators should be denied what they want. What I insist upon is that the Judiciary Committee ought to give this subject a general attention, and, taking all the States together, bring forward a bill revising and enlarging the judiciary wherever it is necessary, instead of taking up isolated cases.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Will the Senator allow me? I just said that that could not be done at this session. I will not say which member of the Judiciary Committee has been struggling for it.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then, in my judgment, this ought not to be done.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Therefore we have reported in favor of additional circuit judges where they are most needed and most called for, and the Senator's own circuit is one of them.

Mr. VOORHEES. But when you state a case like New York, the complaint is just as general from other States as that.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. No.

Mr. VOORHEES. I want a general system to obviate these crying evils.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I concur in what has been said by the Senator from Indiana that there should be a judiciary that within a reasonable time shall be able to dispose of the business. One of the highest duties of a government is to furnish a judiciary which shall be able with diligence to dispose of the litigation between parties in reference to property with reasonable promptness. If you do not do so, there will be parties that will interpose sham defenses merely for the sake of delay, wronging those entitled to property or entitled to the payment of debts.

Now, sir, in reference to the second circuit, the Senator of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. DAVIS] does not overstate, he does not fully state, the great hardship which there exists. The difficulty is not merely as to the business which arises between citizens of that circuit or citizens of New York, but from the fact that the city of New York is the great commercial port of the Union, that it is a city where a very great deal of business is done by people living in other States inland, and all those people will from time to time and have now, many of them, cases pending there that it is of the utmost importance that they should have decided. Experience shows that no one circuit judge, with such aid as he can have from surrounding circuits, the judges of which do aid him, can dispose of that business. Therefore I trust that we shall act upon this bill now.

The wise way to act, I think, is to provide an additional judge in any circuit where an additional judge is necessary to do the business, and decide each case upon its own merits. I know from information from many sources in New York that one circuit judge in the second circuit is entirely unable, laboring as he does most zealously, to attend to the business, to dispose of the current business, to say nothing of the large amount of business in arrears in that circuit.

I hope, therefore, the Senate will act on this bill giving relief to the suitors in the second circuit, many of whom live in other States; and then, in reference to other circuits, if any, which the committee find in a like situation, action should be had.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I would like to vote for a bill which would increase the judicial force in those parts of the country where an increase is needed, or I would rather vote for a bill which would not increase the number of judges and yet would divide them more equitably among the States. I would rather vote for a bill changing some of the circuits, the territorial divisions, and throw some of the States that now are in circuits where a great deal of business is transacted into circuits where not so much business is transacted.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The city of New York is an exception. It is utterly impossible to make any such change there. They do need two judges where one is needed elsewhere. There is no disguising that fact.

Mr. WHYTE. Do not Connecticut and Vermont belong to that circuit?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. But the business is in New York. The district judges do all of the other business. New York City alone really needs two additional circuit judges.

Mr. WHYTE. I am only afraid that this is an entering-wedge for increasing the Federal judiciary all over the country.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I will say to the Senator frankly that wherever it is necessary it should be done. In his circuit there is no call for an additional judge.

Mr. WHYTE. None whatever.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. He is not needed; but the statistics show that in two or three other places additional judges are needed. I think an additional circuit judge is needed in the extreme southern circuit; I believe an additional circuit judge is needed in the western circuit, that of Judge Dillon; and I know it is needed in the Chicago circuit.

Mr. WHYTE. I should like to vote for a bill which I was satisfied was absolutely necessary; but as there is no printed report——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I have made all the statement needed.

Mr. WHYTE. I grant that the distinguished Senator from Illinois, than whom nobody is more competent to express an opinion upon a subject of this kind, has already told us of the need in New York. I am not disputing that. The question with me is whether you cannot get the force from some other quarter without making another circuit judge and establishing the precedent that whenever an increased amount of legal business occurs in a district or circuit we must make a judge to meet it.

The Federal judiciary will be largely relieved of their work when the bankrupt law is repealed. A great deal of the business which has occupied the Federal courts in the last ten years will be taken away by the repeal of the bankrupt law.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Very little circuit business.

Mr. WHYTE. But it is district business, and a great many of the cases in the district courts will probably be better attended to and will not require an appeal to the circuit court.

I will not further occupy the time of the Senate but give the Senator from Illinois, who has charge of the bill, the opportunity of a vote on it; but I shall vote against it as it now comes up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Let us take the vote on this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection——

Mr. INGALLS. If there is to be no further discussion I shall not object to a vote being taken; but if there is to be additional debate my duty will require me to call for the unfinished business.

Several SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is continued before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, no objection being made. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

On the passage of the bill, a division was called for, which resulted—ayes 30, noes 9. So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1951) for the relief of John F. Sutherlin & Brother, of Parke County, Indiana.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 312) for the relief of Robert Coles.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 3079) to provide means for giving official notice of the acts of the Government, and to provide for the advertisements required by the several Departments of the Government; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4105) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase pensions in certain cases," approved June 18, 1874.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker pro tempore of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 3373) for the relief of settlers on the public lands under the pre-emption laws; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4549) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. McCREERY, it was Ordered, That the papers pertaining to the application of Benjamin Alsop be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ARTICLES FOR EXHIBITION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the bill providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAYARD. I would ask the Senate to allow me to call up and have passed a House bill which if not passed now will be useless to the parties for whose benefit it is intended. It is a bill to provide for the free entry of articles imported for exhibition by societies established for the encouragement of the arts and sciences. It is a matter I believe that will not occupy any time in debate. If the Senator in charge of the unfinished business will permit this to pass, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. INGALLS. It is very ungracious to resist solicitations of this kind, and I have already done violence to my feelings in declining to yield to several gentlemen who have importuned me in a similar way; and I regret to do so in this case. I think if the bill now under consideration can be proceeded with, in the course of an hour it can be disposed of, and I believe I must insist on the regular order. Of course it rests with the Senate to say whether it shall go on or not.

Mr. BAYARD. I appreciate the position of the honorable Senator from Kansas. He does not like to make me an exception. Therefore I move that the present order be informally passed by in order to take up House bill No. 4413. If I thought it would lead to any debate, I would not ask that it should be taken up.

Mr. HAMLIN. Please state what it is.

Mr. BAYARD. The object is to provide for the free entry of articles imported for exhibition by societies established for the encouragement of the arts and sciences. It will lead to no debate. If it does I shall not insist upon it.

Mr. MORRILL. This is a House bill and there is an amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance that will, I think, sufficiently guard it, so that there will be no objection to the bill on the part of any one.

Mr. INGALLS. If this bill will give rise to no debate, I will consent that the pending order may be informally laid aside, that the bill may be read and passed.

Mr. HOWE. Subject to call.

Mr. INGALLS. Subject to call for the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be the understanding.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4413) to provide for the free entry of articles imported for exhibition by societies established for encouragement of the arts or sciences, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 6, after the word "material," to insert the word "hereafter;" in line 9, after the word "sale," to insert "nor for any other purpose than is hereinbefore expressed, and all such articles imported as aforesaid now in bond," so as to read:

That all works of art, collections in illustration of the progress of the arts, science, or manufactures, photographs, works in terra cotta, Parian, pottery, or porcelain, and artistic copies of antiques, in metal or other material, hereafter imported in good faith for permanent exhibition at a fixed place by any society or institution established for the encouragement of the arts or science, and not intended for sale, nor for any other purpose than is hereinbefore expressed, and all such articles, imported as aforesaid, now in bond, and all like articles imported in good faith by any society or association for the purpose of erecting a public monument, and not for sale, shall be admitted free of duty, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of the first section the following proviso:

Provided, That the parties importing articles as aforesaid shall be required to give bonds, with sufficient sureties, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, for the payment of lawful duties which may accrue should any of the articles aforesaid be sold, transferred, or used contrary to the provisions and intent of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That all articles described in this act imported for and exhibited at the late international exhibition, upon which duties have not been paid at the passage of this act, may be included within its provisions.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask to have read again the latter part of the section which is now the last section of the bill, that which makes a distinction between articles that have and have not paid duty heretofore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read as amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the parties importing articles as aforesaid shall be required to give bonds, with sufficient sureties, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, for the payment of lawful duties which may accrue should any of the articles aforesaid be sold, transferred, or used contrary to the provisions and intent of this act.

Mr. CONKLING. Now will the Secretary read what precedes that. A distinction occurs between articles that have already paid and those that have not paid duty.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And not intended for sale, nor for any other purpose than is hereinbefore expressed, and all such articles, imported as aforesaid, now in bond, and all like articles imported in good faith by any society or association for the purpose of erecting a public monument, and not for sale, shall be admitted free of duty, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Mr. CONKLING. I think then the language I want read is contained in the section stricken out. I will look. [Examining the bill at the desk.] The language I referred to was in the section which has been stricken out.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL AMENDMENTS.

Mr. PLUMB submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4236) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CANAL AROUND CASCADES OF COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. MITCHELL. I submit an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 4236) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, to amend by striking out the words "seventy-five" in line 359, page 15, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "three hundred;" which I ask may lie on the table, and on Monday next I shall ask the Senate to give me about fifteen or twenty minutes in making explanations of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will lie on the table.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. PLUMB. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to move that the bill (S. No. 26) to donate a portion of the military reservation of Fort Harker to the State of Kansas for the establishment of an educational or charitable institution, and to open the remainder of said reservation to settlement, be recommitted to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3259) providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. BAYARD to strike out after the word "dollar," in line 109 of section 3, the words "and fifty cents;" so as to read:

And provided further, Upon property without the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and to be so designated by the assessors in their annual returns, the rate for any one year shall not exceed one dollar on every one hundred dollars.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I think the same objection arises here that we had yesterday of making a distinction in the rate of taxation rather than in the valuation. If I understand this amendment, it is what? The bill already provides that property in the city of Washington shall pay a tax of a dollar and a half on the hundred dollars of valne. Now this amendment proposes that outside of the city and within the District the tax shall be one dollar per hundred. If I am correct, that is the effect of the amendment.

Mr. DORSEY. Exactly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I can see no just reason for that. All property is to be valued at its cash value. Let us illustrate for a moment. Two men commence business here with $10,000 in money to operate in this city and in this District. One of them invests in valuable property on a street here, buys a town lot or two town lots or whatever he chooses and takes his chances. The other invests in fifty or one hundred acres a mile or two or three or four miles out of town, and takes his chances. They both put in $10,000. The one has ten times, twenty times, a hundred times as much property as the other. Why should he not pay the same rate of tax on his money that the other pays? I can see no reason for a distinction.

I have had something to do with taxation in other places, and I could never see any good reason for making a distinction in the rate of taxation. Make it in the valuation, if any is to be made. If a man says his property is worth $10,000 in the city, and another says his is worth $10,000 out of the city on account of having more of it, why should the latter pay less tax than the former? If a man owns a horse that is worth $500, for instance, and another owns a horse worth only a hundred, why not make each of them pay, as we do under this bill as it is, a dollar and a half on each one hundred dollars, so that one would pay seven dollars and a half tax and the other a dollar and a half. It seems to me that the horse worth a hundred dollars being of less value than the other, its owner should pay not a less rate of tax? I certainly cannot see any good reason for a difference of rate. So far none has been given that is convincing to me why there should be any distinction made in the rate of taxation after the property has been assessed and valued and the cash value put upon it.

Why, Mr. President, look at this thing. We begin here at a rate of a dollar and a half in the city, and we lower it to $1 when we get out a mile or two. How far shall we have to go until a man will pay no tax at all if we were to proceed in that way? It seems to me after you get out a short distance there would probably be a premium offered for a man to live there. In our country we pay taxes according to value and no distinction is made as to rate. If one man has a farm worth $20 or $50 an acre he pays taxes upon that; if another has a piece of land worth only $5 an acre, as a good deal of it is, he pays on $5, and that is fair. We should not say that the man who owns a farm worth $50 an acre should pay $2 or $1.50 on the hundred while another because his land is valued at less should pay but $1 per hundred, and we ought not to say it here. Unless some reasons are given to show me why I should vote otherwise, I must oppose this amendment.

Mr. DORSEY. I think the Senator from Nebraska has hardly considered the subject fully. The property in the cities of Washington and Georgetown has many advantages that property in the District outside of those cities has not; for example, the people living in these cities pay more tax because they have a larger degree of protection; they have police, they have a fire department, they have water, they have all the conveniences of large cities. The people in the country have none of these conveniences, and they should not pay for things that they have not got. More than that, property in the city is more productive than property in the country. I believe everywhere, in every city in the land, the rate of taxation is graduated, beginning at the commercial portion of the city and ranging out, growing less and less as the property gets back into the country. I know in Saint Louis that taxes in the county are about one-half what they are in the city. I think it is true probably of the Senator's own State that the tax on property in the county is much less than in the city.

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, sir; I will correct the Senator. We have no different rate of tax; we have a different rate of valuation of property, but there is no difference in the rate of tax.

Mr. DORSEY. So far as I know, in almost every city in the Union there is a different rate of tax as between the city itself and the country surrounding the city, and for the reasons which I have just stated, to wit, that the city has protection in the way of police, in the way of a fire department, a fire-alarm telegraph, water supply, and all the conveniences of modern civilization, which the country has not, and which the country ought not to pay for in the city. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Delaware will be adopted.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am by no means relieved from any difficulty, if I had any, upon the subject. On the contrary, I am more and more convinced that I am correct. Take a piece of property over in Georgetown. If a man goes there and buys a house and lot on the outskirts for $5,000 that would cost him $25,000 if farther in the city, he ought to pay on his five thousand dollars' worth of property at the same rate as a man would pay on a house and lot in the center of this city worth $25,000, because the property worth $25,000 will be taxed, having the advantages of light and water, &c., greater than the less valuable property. That is the very reason why the one property is worth $25,000 rather than a less sum. He pays for these advantages in that way. He has to give more money for it, in the first place. The proper way is to tax him just what his property is worth and the other man just what his property is worth. That is the fair and just principle. As I said before, if you would run this principle out, as you would get farther out of the city you would reach a point where the people would pay no tax at all. If you lessen the tax 50 per cent. for going three miles, you ought to lessen it still more for going ten miles. There is no good ground for this discrimination at all. The rate of tax ought to be the same on everything.

Mr. CONKLING. I agree entirely with the principle enunciated by the Senator who has just taken his seat, but it happens, as it usually does, that the difficulty is not in the abstract assertion of the principle, but in the application of it. Of course a man who owns $5,000 of property ought to pay, all other things being equal, a given rate upon that property as much as if its value was $25,000; but what should he pay for? That is the question. How are you to apply the principle? Should he pay taxes for that which is foreign to him, which he received no benefit from at all? I had supposed certainly not. What is it in the State of New York, and I presume in every other State, that breeds a still-beginning, never-ending conflict as to the limits of cities? Why is it that in the city in which I live there is a constant struggle going on from the inside to extend the line of the city and from the outside to prevent that extension? If it be true that within the city limits and without, on an even yield, everybody should be taxed alike for what the city has, why is it that there is a constant grapple for the mastery between these two ideas—the extension and limitation of the area of cities?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONKLING. I was asking my honorable friend a question; but I shall be very glad to hear him.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I understand the Senator to ask why we should pay on property which yields no income; I believe that is the substance; on property that is not yielding any profit to the holder. Nine-tenths of the property in my State is yielding nothing whatever. What would the Senator do in that case? Would he not tax the prairie lands there that yield no profit?

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator entirely mistakes my proposition. I am not speaking of what property yields.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am glad to be corrected.

Mr. CONKLING. I need not go to the Senator's State nor to my own to show that a piece of property out of the city, as compared with property in the city has very little of rents, issues, or profits. The suggestion which I was endeavoring to make to him is of a wholly different kind. Let me see if I cannot restate it, or state it so as to make it clear. As the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DORSEY] has said, the city of Washington has police, a fire department, street lamps, a fire-telegraph-alarm, a great variety of appliances and apparatus, the whole of which cost money.

Mr. DORSEY. And schools.

Mr. CONKLING. I speak now of the mere mechanical appliances of city life, if I may so say. Now, to whom are those appliances useful? To some man who never uses them, who by no possibility ever can use them? To some man whose stacks and barn and house may catch fire and burn down without the possibility of any member of the fire department reaching him with water, or hook or ladder, or any other appliance likely to stay the flames? The fire department is not useful to him.

No doubt the Senator might say that you could put border instances; that you could find the case of a man who lived just across the line, and yet so near that the fire department could reach him. No doubt of it. That is true of all cities. In my own city sometimes an engine is put quickly on a car and run from twenty to fifty miles and reaches there in time to take part in extinguishing a fire. Those are sporadic cases; they are exceptions; and general rules are never made to provide for exceptions. The main truth is that the city limits bound practically the use of such appliances. That is the convenient line of demarkation. Therefore the committee in this bill made a distinction, as other committees in all such bills. Such bills arise usually in State Legislatures, touching the charter of cities, and such questions come before boards of supervisors; but wherever they come, I had supposed a distinction was well recognized in levying taxes as between those who ought to pay for a given thing and those who ought not.

Let me again illustrate that point. Under the charters of many cities in the State of New York, when a pavement is first laid the tax-payers of the city at large pay for that pavement. Afterward it must be kept in repair by local assessment; but the outlay is a general charge upon the tax-payers of that city. Here is a street to be paved from one block to another. It is to be expensively paved, and it is to cost a good many thousand dollars. It is for the local convenience of the people who would be separated in trade and traffic if this bad stock of pavement or this stock of no pavement were left remaining. Is it reasonable that a man who owns a farm five or ten miles from that city should be taxed to put down that pavement, or to lay down that crossing, or to erect that lamp-post, or to dig that sewer, or to do that other thing which is local in its uses and effects? If it is, the Legislature of the State of New York has been acting under a blunder which began in the times of our grandfathers, and I think before that, because always in the adjustment of taxes the distinction which I am endeavoring to state has been preserved, namely, that those who organize and live under a city government with its extraordinary charges and its extraordinary advantages, are the persons upon whom should be levied the tribute necessary to pay for its expenses.

A Senator behind me reminded me a moment ago of the schools. Take the matter of city schools. Here are schools which children cannot attend except the children within the city limits. The Senator may say that there is no regulation of law to prevent children coming from beyond the boundaries and attending school. I was taking it for an illustration. In other cities it is established by law that the schools are open to those who live within the prescribed boundaries. Here it is not so by law, but it is so by necessity. Of what advantage is it to say to a man who lives five miles away "your children can attend school in Washington?" It is like the right to shear the wolf; you have the abstract right but you cannot get the fleece. So the children, if they can be transported five miles, can go to school, but in point of fact they cannot be transported and they do not attend the school. A Senator says that one-quarter of the outlay here is for public schools. Can it be that a man who lives beyond the limits, who enjoys no sort of advantage from that source, whether his property be in value $5,000 or $10,000, should be taxed as the Senator should be or as I should be if we were residents here where our children can go and do go to the public schools?

Mr. President, it seems to me this question has often been discussed before; if I remember I have two or three times taken some slight part in the discussion myself; and I had supposed that if anything had been affirmed by the experience and concurrence of legislation, sustained by public opinion, it was that levying taxes should have respect to the question whether the person on whom they were to be levied had any interest or not in the things which the taxes were to pay for. There are many respects in which those taxed may have the benefit of the advantages of the city government. Precisely where the line of demarkation should be, whether the difference should be more or less, is another thing which at this moment I am not prepared to speak of. The committee, doubtless, have framed the bill in that particular; but that there should be some difference between those who do and those who do not profit by the advantages in a city which are local to that city, had seemed to me to be too clear for discussion.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It seems to me that that very distinction is made, and it is made in the value of the property. It is proper and right to require the taxes to be paid by the people of the city; and who pay the taxes? Does not the property in being valued higher in the city than out of the city pay for the advantages given to the city property? When you speak about furnishing water, it is not furnished free; the consumer pays for it; and when you speak about gas, it is not furnished free: that is paid for. Therefore, I still do not see any reason why $1 of property owned three miles out from the capital should not pay on that dollar just the same that a dollar would pay around the Dome of the Capitol. I say the difference ought to be made and will be made in the valuation of the property. If an acre of property within the city limits is valued at a large amount, ten times probably at what it would be valued outside the city, why should not the property outside pay one-tenth as much tax? That is the doctrine I assert.

So far as schools are concerned, I say to Senators that if schools are not provided for the whole District they ought to be, and I am ready to vote for extending the advantages of the schools all over the District.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is so now.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The Senator from Maine says it is so now. If so, the argument is already answered. So far as these advantages are concerned they apply more to the people outside of the city than they do to the people within the city. Here are your parks, here are your avenues, your streets all paved, and everybody uses them. People travel over them day after day without paying a dollar for the privileges they enjoy. Your public parks are open to those outside the same as they are to the people of the city. Yet you say that their property shall pay 50 per cent. less than the property inside the city limits, dollar for dollar. Make your difference in the valuation of the property, not in the rate of taxation, and then you will do equal and exact justice to all.

I do not wish to take further time of the Senate on this point. I may be wrong; but I am not convinced yet but what I am right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MERRIMON in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 8 of the reprint of the bill, line 109 of section 3, it is proposed to strike out, after the word "dollar," the words "and fifty cents;" so as to read:

And provided further, Upon property without the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and to be so designated by the assessors in their annual returns, the rate for any one year shall not exceed $1 on every $100.

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 30, noes 13.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I move to amend by inserting after the word "upon," in line 106 of this section, the word "real;" so as to read:

Upon real property without the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and to be so designated by the assessors in their annual returns, the rate for any one year shall not exceed $1 on every $100.

Mr. DORSEY. I hope that will be adopted.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I inquire of the Senator from Iowa if that would not leave the tax at $1.50 on personal property without the limits of the cities. Without the amendment the tax of $1 per hundred would be levied "upon property."

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It will leave personal property at $1.50.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask if that is proper. We have reduced the tax on real estate. Should there not be the same reduction on personal estate outside of the cities of Washington and Georgetown that there is upon the real estate?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I was about to give my reason for offering the amendment, and that will answer the Senator's question. We have said by the amendment which has just been adopted that property outside of the city limits shall pay one dollar on the hundred.

Mr. EATON. Does not "property" mean both real and personal estate? Both go to make up "property."

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I suppose that to be so; and understanding it to be so my amendment proposes to change it, and the reason, if Senators will allow me, why I think it ought to be changed, I am now about to assign.

As I said, we have just adopted an amendment that property outside the city limits shall pay only $1 on the hundred. That will include both real and personal property. It strikes me that the result will be that a large portion of persons who hold very large amounts of personal property which are used and profitably used inside of the city limits will have their residence outside of the city limits, where they can be surrounded by beautiful grounds; and while their capital, their money, which is used in the city, is deriving to them a large profit, on account of their residence outside of the city limits, they will escape taxation in the city. A banker, for instance, in the city, with a capital of $100,000 invested in banking, which yields him a very handsome percentage, buys a few acres of ground just outside of the city limits and puts up a handsome residence, and enjoys all the benefits of the streets and lights, &c., of the city, and yet his hundred thousand dollars do not pay as much tax as the residence of a neighbor just across the line inside of the city.

Mr. BAYARD. Has he there the water, the gas, and the police presence of the city?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. He has all those substantially.

Mr. BAYARD. It seems to me not so.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I submit the amendment to the Senate. I think it is in the interest of simple right and justice between man and man, and does precisely the right thing. I know how apt persons who acquire large fortunes are to get outside of the city limits, a little beyond the limits, where they can have more room and beautiful grounds. If they should attempt to do that for the purpose of escaping taxation at the same time, it does not strike me that it would be for the benefit of the city.

Mr. EATON. I suggest to my friend from Iowa that whenever there is such a result as he imagines there may be, this city will doubtless ask Congress to do what other cities have done in the different States of the Union—extend the city limits so as to embrace such property.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, my intention was in voting for this provision in committee to exempt from the maximum of taxation imposed upon property within the city limits only real estate exclusively used for agricultural purposes in the county outside of the corporate limits of the two cities of Washington and Georgetown. If I had not before seen this bill printed as it is now, I should have said that that was the action of the committee, for I distinctly remember that it was discussed and the object was avowed to be that land used for agricultural purposes should bear a lower rate of taxation than that used for other purposes. But inasmuch as the bill is printed without that distinction, I presume that I am mistaken.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me, he is quite right in his recollection. Such was the conclusion of the committee originally; but upon further discussion it was determined to assess all property alike beyond the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown.

Mr. INGALLS. I presume, then, that when that conclusion was reached I was not present, for I do not recall it.

But the objection which is made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] to the inclusion of personal property within the diminished limit of taxation proposed by this portion of the section, has great weight. I am inclined to think it would be much better to adopt his amendment. I can see no reason why personal property outside of the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown should not bear the same proportionate amount of taxation as the realty inside the corporate limits. But I shall not be strenuous about the matter, although I concur very largely with the views expressed by the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD.]

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 21, and the noes 15; no quorum voting.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, a single word. As I understand this amendment, it is only to require persons living in the District outside of the city limits, in the rural portion of the District, to pay the same rate of taxation on their personal property that parties pay who live within the city limits. I think if Senators will consider a moment they will be satisfied that if we do not adopt this amendment merchants who are doing business in the city and others who have large personal estates will make their residence just out of the city limits and escape the taxation which is essential to carry on the District government. I think there is a reason for exempting the real estate situate outside the city limits, and which is used for agricultural purposes mainly, from as high a rate of taxation as is imposed on real estate situate within the city; but as to personal estate the rate of taxation should be the same whether the owner resides in the District within or without the city limits; otherwise there will be unfair evasions of taxation on personal property.

Mr. CONKLING. When I heard the suggestion made that real estate used for agricultural purposes outside of the city limits ought to be exempted, it struck me that if the purpose had been to select a species of property outside of the District which should not be exempted that very designation would have been made. Why? Real estate used for agricultural purposes is the only real estate in the District outside of the city which yields rents, issues, and profits. All other real estate, to borrow a phrase that I heard the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] employ yesterday, is merely for shelter. How can it be said that real estate used for agricultural purposes, the employment of money-making, should be exempted any more than any other property? I cannot see that. Yesterday I heard stoutly denied in the Senate, and by Senators who favor this amendment I think, that there was any distinction between real and personal property as to the burdens it should bear. Now it seems there is a distinction, and founded on what? On an allegation which I think every Senator will bear me out in saying has been falsified by every practical instance to which he can turn his mind. The distinction is sought to be based upon the idea that particular persons in trade in the city will select residences away for the purpose of avoiding taxation. I heard it said a good many years ago that human nature is the same the world over. I take it that the same motives which move men in the city of Washington move men in other cities. Does anybody know of such an experience? I heard a very wise man say once that a man should always sleep where his business is. I think there is a good deal in it, when you come to consider that a man should be where his business is; but is it true as a rule that men in cities to escape city taxation live in the country and come in and do business in the city? How far does that obtain? On the contrary I venture the assertion that so attractive are the opportunities, the advantages, the conveniences of the cities, that the reverse is always the fact. In the city of New York, I know, people have been driven to go across into New Jersey, and into King's County, and into other places near the city, above Spuyten Duyvil, (they would go if we had rapid transit, and will go now that we are to have it,) because of the necessity of the thing, because of actually being crowded out by the rents and the scarcity of tenements; but show me an instance of a city like this, for example, where there is "ample room and verge enough" for everybody to reside in the city where men engaged in business actively, men who have large affairs, men who would be valuable tax-payers, go and live the year round miles away out in the country for the purpose of avoiding taxation.

Mr. President, I do not believe that that is sound. On the contrary, as I listened to my friend from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD,] I thought, as I believe the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] suggested in one form, that would be an exceedingly artful piece of legislation, it would really rise into the domain of statesmanship, if we could pass a tax bill which would induce men who have money to go and build a fringe of houses, of villas, around, just outside the city limits, as the honorable Senator from Iowa supposes. Whenever they do it, the city limits will certainly overtake them as fast as they go, and we shall bring into the area of taxation new elements which will be exceedingly valuable, not to say lucrative, as tax-payers.

I do not believe that such a distinction as that ought to be made between people who live away, deprived of the facilities of the schools and of the various things which have been alluded to in the course of the debate.

Mr. KERNAN. It will be borne in mind that we are legislating for the District of Columbia as a whole, which is a small territory, comparatively. It seemed to me, and does now, that in legislating for this District, where there is to be no taxation except what is under this bill, all persons who live in the District should pay the same rate of tax on their personal property for the support of the District government. That is my judgment, and therefore I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. BECK. Since the yeas and nays are called for, as it seems to be fashionable to give the reasons for our votes upon the amendment, I will state that I shall certainly vote against the amendment, and for this reason: the personal property of persons living outside of the city limits receives no sort of protection from the District government. The real estate cannot be stolen; it cannot be burned; nothing can happen to that; and persons living outside of the city with personal property get no benefit of the police or of the fire department or any of the protection that is given to persons living inside of the city limits.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky if a gentleman living at the head of New Jersey avenue, at the place called Le Droit Park, where there are some of the finest residences in this locality, who is doing bank business in the city, would not have all the protection for his banking interests that he would have if he lived under the wings of the Capitol?

Mr. BECK. Oh, there may be one or two exceptional cases just outside the limits; but take a person living seven miles out, beyond Brightwood, and that is within the District. The police and the fire department of this city out there are absolutely worth nothing. It does seem to me that 1 per cent. on the personal property of persons living in the country is all that anybody ought to be required to pay. For that reason I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 21; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yesterday the Senate adopted an amendment which I offered providing that upon amounts of money paid in for taxes within a certain time there should be a deduction of 5 per cent. and the further provision was made upon the amount so paid in the collector should only have one-half commissions. I have learned that the collector is paid a salary and not by commissions. Therefore, in lines 117 and 118, I move to strike out these words from the amendment which I submitted yesterday and which was agreed to:

And upon the amount so paid in the collector shall receive only one-half commissions.

Mr. HAMLIN. That amendment is not now in order, but the Senator can reach his object when we get into the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. It may be done now by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be done now by unanimous consent.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The collector receives a salary, and does not receive commissions.

Mr. DORSEY. The collector of the District receives no commissions for the collection of taxes, and therefore those words should come out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I submit an amendment which I suggest shall come in after the word "dollars," in line 110, on the eighth page. After the word "dollars" I move to insert:

And a poll-tax of $1 shall be annually assessed upon and collected of every male inhabitant of the District who shall be twenty-one years of age or upward.

It has been suggested all around this body that funds are necessary for the purpose of supporting the city government, and we have reduced the rate of tax from $2 to $1.50 on the $100. There is a very large number of people in this District who are not the owners of any visible personal or real estate. They use your streets. If they are parents they have the benefit of the schools for their children. They ought to be required to pay under the law for the protection which they have. They have rights equal to the man who may be worth his millions and who is assessed thousands of dollars on both personal and real property. I do not know how large is that number, but it must necessarily be very large. The law thus affording to every inhabitant and every citizen its protection, I hold first that every inhabitant should contribute something to what the law and the government afford him. I have fixed the rate at the small sum of $1, which may probably yield to the treasury of the District some $15,000 or $20,000.

Mr. TELLER. As a poll-tax?

Mr. HAMLIN. I propose a poll-tax of a single dollar. I think it eminently just, and have offered it and shall vote for it.

Mr. WHYTE. I shall be pardoned, I am sure, by the Senator from Maine for expressing my surprise that such a proposition should come from that source, to impose upon the poor colored people in this District a tax of a dollar a head, when some of them actually have to be supported by the Government. They are in such poverty and want here that we have actually to provide for taking care of them. It would be a very hard thing to put upon many of these poor people a tax of a dollar a head; it would be great cruelty. I remember that there was great complaint on the other side of the Chamber some time ago about a poll-tax in Georgia upon the poor colored people down there; and I must confess that I am surprised that the Georgia doctrine should have traveled so quickly up to Maine.

Mr. CONKLING. Was not that as a condition of voting?

Mr. WHYTE. I do not know. This is a condition of living which is a little worse. This is imposing a tax upon a man for breathing the pure air of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me, the amendment does not propose to kill him if he does not pay the tax.

Mr. WHYTE. But it will kill some if they are made to pay the tax. [Laughter.] We have to feed them. They cannot buy a loaf of bread. Our feelings have been agonized and tears wrung from our eyes and our hearts torn into shreds, year after year, by appeals to feed these poor, unfortunate colored people in the District of Columbia. And now we are going to tax them! I cannot vote for that. I am not hard-hearted enough to tax the poor colored people in the District of Columbia, and I hope our friend from Maine will withdraw the proposition.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I draw no distinction between the white and colored citizen of the District. I would impose the tax upon every individual male inhabitant of this District above the age of twenty-one years; but I would make one limitation, and I will make that in my amendment. I ask the Secretary to add:

Who shall not have received support in any way from the authorities of the District of Columbia for the preceding year.

I would exclude that class. With that addition I certainly shall vote for my amendment, and I hope that others will, and that it will prevail.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine how this tax can be enforced against these poor people? It seems to me it would cost more to enforce it than the tax would amount to.

Mr. HAMLIN. It would be enforced just as it is in nineteen States out of twenty every day.

Mr. ALLISON. By the seizure of property?

Mr. SARGENT. In the States it is a condition of voting, and therefore it almost enforces itself.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me that it would be impracticable to collect this tax. In some of the States they have a poll-tax and provide that if the parties do not pay it they may be arrested and confined a certain length of time and put in a lock-up until they do pay it. The result will be, if this amendment is adopted, that a portion of the very poor people in the District will endeavor to pay and will pay this tax, but a great proportion of them will not pay it. It would act unequally on poor people. I think the true idea of taxation is that the men who have the property should pay the taxes. The poll-tax is an objectionable tax at all times everywhere. I think, owing to the peculiar condition of the inhabitants who are called poor people in this District, a poll-tax ought not to be imposed on them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 25, noes 16.

Mr. BUTLER and Mr. EATON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. I am inclined to believe that the motion of the Senator from Maine is improvidently made. There is probably a larger per cent. of population in this community that is incapable of self-support (the causes for this I need not advert to) and that requires constant assistance from public and private charity than in any other community in this country. This tax, under its best aspects, when accompanied by the privilege of voting, is always an odious one; and in this case, deprived of its usual complement, that is, the privilege of voting, to which it is attached, it is open to peculiar objections, because it appears to be a tax simply upon the right to live. The tax is to be imposed upon the citizen or resident of the District merely because he lives here; and there is not, as is the case in communities generally, attached to it the right of exercising the electoral franchise. In those States with whose laws I am familiar the poll-tax is imposed upon those who vote, and the person upon whom it is imposed who refuses to pay it is deprived of the right to vote. There it is one of the conditions of voting, but in this case there is no voting to any considerable extent to be exercised here. The Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate have included in the bill a provision for electing a Delegate to Congress, but there is strong opposition to that, and should it be stricken out, as appears probable, there will be nothing left for a voter to elect in this District.

Again, this tax will be practically nugatory. As has been intimated, the class of people upon whom it will be imposed are very largely men without property, either personal or real. If, as is necessary in imposing a tax, you provide the machinery for collecting it in case the parties are delinquent, the result will be that it will cost more to collect or to attempt to collect the payment that is not made than you will realize from those who pay this tax. The whole machinery of the law will have to be set in operation to collect this tax, either to arrest the man who does not pay it or in some way to impose proceedings by justices.

Mr. WHYTE. They will have to provide for it.

Mr. INGALLS. They will have to exculpate themselves by showing that they have no means of payment, and it will cost $5 or $10 in every case where a man refuses to pay and you attempt to enforce collection. It will therefore impose a very great burden upon the resources of the District without, so far as I am able to see, any corresponding advantage either to the individual or the community.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas a question if he will permit me. I have not the time to look at the statutes, and I presume the Senator can answer me at once. Is there any existing machinery now by which this poll-tax can be collected? In other words, will it not be necessary, if we adopt this amendment, to provide the machinery for its enforcement? I am informed by the Senator from Arkansas, who is very familiar with the subject, that he understands there is no provision for a personal liability or a personal proceeding against a person to enforce taxes in this District at all. If that be true, I desire to suggest to the Senator from Maine to withdraw his amendment, for which I voted, until he may accompany it with some mechanism for the collection of the tax.

Mr. INGALLS. The understanding I have on this subject is that in order to enforce this tax, should it be authorized by this bill, it will be necessary to create an entire system of machinery for enforcing its collection.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Kansas if he has examined that matter? It would certainly be wonderful to me if there was not already here the machinery necessary to distrain property as a means of collecting taxes.

Mr. INGALLS. Undoubtedly; but we are discussing that class of citizens or residents of the District who have no property, real or personal.

Mr. HARRIS. I understand that the amendment of the Senator from Maine applies to any class of citizens or people in the District.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly not.

Mr. HARRIS. It applies to all who fall within its provisions.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. Then if there be a means by which you may distrain property for the collection of taxes, I cannot see the necessity for any independent machinery to enforce the amendment of the Senator from Maine if the Senate should see proper to adopt it, as I myself am inclined to think it should be adopted.

Mr. INGALLS. But this class of persons to whom I allude are those who have no property against which distraint could issue, and yet they will be equally liable and the machinery of the law will be set in motion against them individually to enforce the collection of the tax either by imprisonment or by exculpation upon proceedings to show that they may take advantage of the pauper act.

Mr. BECK. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from Kansas in this connection. While a large number of persons of the very poorer classes may not be reached by the poll-tax, there may be a very large number of quite thrifty men, men who are employed in the Departments, men who are clerks in stores, men who have no families, and no houses, and who may have invested their money in the bonds of the United States who cannot be reached in any other way except by a poll-tax. And while we may not get all we ought to get from a class of persons who really have property which ought to pay a tax, we can get a poll-tax from many who will not otherwise be reached who are getting the benefit of police, the fire department, &c. It can do no harm to insert this provision, even if we fail to secure the poll-tax from a large number of persons who ought to pay it.

Mr. INGALLS. The point I made was that to enforce proceedings against those who were unable or unwilling to pay would probably cost more than we should realize from those who did pay.

Mr. BECK. That might or might not be so.

Mr. INGALLS. It rests, of course, with the discretion and good judgment of the Senate whether to impose this tax or not.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the present law of the District, as I understand, is that on failure of the payment of taxes the collector of taxes—

May distrain sufficient goods and chattels found within said District, and belonging to the person, persons, association, firm, or corporation charged with such tax, * * * and for want of such goods and chattels said collector may levy upon and sell at auction, in like manner, the estate and interest of such person, firm, association, or corporation in any parcel of land in said District, and in that case the proceedings as to such land subsequent to sale shall be the same as in the case of taxes against real estate.

So that it would require, to make the amendment for which I myself voted satisfactory to me, some slight modification.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have modified the amendment, and I ask that it be read as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment, as modified, reads:

And a poll-tax of $1 shall be annually assessed upon, and collected of, every male inhabitant of the District who shall be twenty-one years of age or upwards, and who shall not have received support in any manner from the authorities of the District of Columbia for the preceding year, and said tax hereby imposed shall be levied and collected as other taxes.

Mr. WHYTE. The Senator from Maine will pardon me for saying that that is a matter absolutely impossible of accomplishment, collecting this as other taxes. There is only one mode I suppose that could be adopted where a man had no property and owed this dollar poll-tax, and that would be to sell him; he might be sold or his time might be sold. I hardly think in this age and generation and in our enlightenment we propose to sell people. It would be very cruel to sell their time, even to compel them to work upon the public roads, to compel them to render in time service in the payment of this tax. It is a tax which it is absolutely impossible to collect. You would collect it from the man who had property and not collect a dollar from a man who had none. You would have to provide under the laws of this District for a system of machinery to collect it even from those who could pay it; and you would have to provide for a system of insolvency by which a man who was taken into custody charged with the debt which he owed to the District of Columbia should have some means of swearing out of the imprisonment, or the confinement, or the duress under which he was put.

It is utterly impossible unless it is the entering wedge for such a poll-tax as will entitle them to vote, and I am not going to vote it for any such purpose. I shall vote against every proposition for a council, the successor of the "feather-duster" council that we remember to have had in this District a few years ago, the successors of those gentlemen who carried away the sponges and the sand-boxes and the chairs and the feather-dusters, when they retired from their august body, the council that reigned over the affairs of this District some time ago. I am opposed to such a council, and I am opposed to a Delegate in Congress. I am opposed to these things upon those old, it may be unfortunate, democratic notions that I inherited, that it is wrong to tax people without representation, that it is wrong to put a poll-tax upon a man unless he is to have the privilege of saying who is to govern him. It is wrong to put an individual, personal tax upon a man unless he is to have the privilege of organizing the machinery of making the officers who are to execute it by the right of suffrage at the polls. I am opposed to it. I am opposed to it upon the great principle that this District belongs to the people of the United States, not to the people that have happened to cluster around this Capitol, some to be fed by the bounty of the Government, some to make money out of the temporary inhabitants that come here, and some because it is a pleasant place to live in and get good society in and to come here for the winter.

I am opposed to allowing people who are here in the District because it happens to be the Federal city, having any representation in either House of Congress. It is our duty, it is our privilege, it is the right of the people of the United States that its Congress shall determine what is right, what is proper, what is good for the government of the District of Columbia within the line as it now stands; and therefore these people ought not to be represented in either branch of Congress. They have no right to be represented here. We represent this District. It is our duty to take charge of it; it is our duty to legislate for it; it is our duty to make officers of the District under our supreme control; and therefore I shall vote against every proposition which looks to the establishment of suffrage in this District again. Therefore I oppose this as the initiative. You can only collect this tax by making it payable at the polls, and almost every man knows that it is a curse to any community to have a poll-tax. Many men tell me that the tax does not fall upon the voter but generally comes out of the pocket of the candidate. It is corrupting in its influence; it is corrupting in its power; it enables men to get votes by the payment of a small sum of money, and is as bad and as rotten as some of the boroughs in England used to be in its system and in its operation.

I hope the Senate will impose no such tax. We tax the property; we tax the personal property of parties who come here to get the benefit of a residence in this District, to get the protection of the police, to get the protection of the fire department, to get the advantage of the schools, to get the benign influence which clusters around the Congress of the United States and makes everybody happy when he comes within a radius of two miles of it. These people when they bring their property here ought to pay taxes upon it, because they pay no tax elsewhere. They get water and food and light through the influence of the Government. They ought to contribute a proportionate part of the expense; not more; for I have examined the subject with great care. When Congress imposed upon me during my absence the duty of acting as one of a commission under a law of the Forty-fourth Congress, I took the trouble to examine from the beginning, from the foundation of the Government, down to that time, what the relative position of the residents of the District and the Government of the United States as regards property really was; and I became satisfied, not that the ratio should be according to this bill, but that the Government ought to contribute 60 per cent. of the taxes and the people here but 40 per cent. The bill, I think, calls for half and half—50 per cent. from each.

I examined the question with great care, and as one of the brightest lights leading me to that conclusion, the report of Mr. Poland, of Vermont, was the clearest, the plainest, the most conclusive argument upon that subject, for he discussed the whole of it. Having looked at this subject in all its bearings, I am satisfied it is for the good of the substantial people of this District that there shall be no tax in the nature of a poll-tax, or a tax looking to suffrage in the District; that there should be no suffrage in the District; but that all the government should be in the hands of Congress and the commissioners. My theory was commissioners made into a corporation to govern the District; but the bill which the Senate has before it provides merely for commissioners as officers of the District of Columbia under the control of Congress. But that is the true policy for the benefit of the people of this District, and it is the only mode by which Congress can protect the people of this District from being robbed and plundered of their property.

Mr. HAMLIN. I suppose, Mr. President, that we are more or less influenced in our opinions, or that they are formed from the system of laws under which we live or have lived. In New England I think in every State there has been in all time a poll-tax. In my State it has never had any connection with the right of suffrage, nor would I vote for any amendment or any tax that would limit or control the right of suffrage anywhere. The amendment which I have offered here has no earthly connection with the right of suffrage in this District, and therefore all that the Senator from Maryland has said in relation to collecting this tax at the polls or its having any connection with the right of voting has no foundation whatever. If I understand the Senator correctly, he says he is utterly opposed to taxing a community that do not have the right of representation. Well, I will join the Senator in that opinion, and if he will act with me I will act with him. I do not propose to vote for this bill. There is not enough of suffrage in it to command my vote; and yet the Senator, if I understand him aright, is proposing to vote for this bill, which puts the machinery of a government on this District and gives to the good people of it, if we should strike out the clause of which he has spoken, no right whatever, no power whatever in the government by which they are to be controlled.

Now, sir, I would have a mixed government here; I would have a portion of these officers appointed by the General Government, and I would have a portion selected by the people of this District, so that we should have in the contribution of the taxes that we pay officers that shall control or aid in controlling their disbursement. And for the same reason I would have some officers from the District who should join with those of the Government in exercising the municipal authority which is to be exercised here. I hold that if we take all government from the people in relation to municipal affairs, then it becomes our duty to pay all the taxes. Will the Senator from Maryland go with me to that extent? I am willing to vote that; and I am willing to vote a division of taxes when you secure a division of the administration of the laws and the government in this District between the United States and the people of the District; and I will not vote for any bill which seeks to have the entire control of the District placed in the hands of the Government and then taxes the people without giving to them any authority in the expenditure of that taxation.

I surely fail to see anything any more obnoxious in a poll-tax than a tax upon property. I think that every man owes to the Government a contribution for the protection which the law gives him in his person as much as in his property; and certainly the rights of person are higher and more sacred than those of property. It is upon that principle and upon that rule that I would impose a poll-tax here; and if we may not collect the whole we may collect the greater portion of it, precisely as you collect other taxes; and it is, in my judgment, no more objectionable, and it is right in every particular.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think, sir, that by the universal consent of this country, notwithstanding what has been said by the Senator from Maine, a tax of this description is essentially a tax upon suffrage.

Mr. HAMLIN. They have no connection.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. There is no connection proposed here, it is true; but even in the Senator's own State, even in New England, it is confined to males twenty-one years of age and upward. Why? Because males alone are entitled to vote. Why do you confine it to males twenty-one years of age? Why not include all? There is no question of voting about it. Some women are as well able to pay this tax upon the head as men. The tax rests on suffrage everywhere where it is collected. I vote against it because there is no equivalent to be given for it here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] on this question. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded, and the result announced—yeas 25, nays 22; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of section 3 as amended:

All penalties imposed by the act approved March 3, 1877, chapter 117, upon delinquents for default in the payment of taxes levied under said act at the times specified therein, shall, upon payment of the said taxes assessed against such delinquents within three months from the passage of this act, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. thereon, be remitted; and hereafter it shall not be lawful for any collector to demand or receive from any person any greater amount than the taxes assessed against him and interest at the rate aforesaid from the time the same becomes due and payable.

The object of the amendment is this: under the act of March 3, 1877, chapter 117, a penalty was imposed upon delinquents in default of payment of their taxes, at the rate of 2 per cent. per month, a penalty of 24 per cent. a year for delinquency in payment of taxes at the times specified in the act. The taxes are due semi-annually. The first installment of tax was to be paid in the month of December, 1877, and the other installment on the 1st of June of the present year.

Now, I understand that default has been made by a very large number of persons who have been unable to pay their taxes, and they are now subject to a penalty of 2 per cent. a month upon the amount of their taxes. They are unable to pay the taxes without a very great sacrifice; and this enormous penalty is eating up their property, and they will not be able to pay their taxes or redeem their property if that measure of penalty is inflicted. The amendment I propose is to make them pay the tax assessed against them, with 6 per cent. interest upon that tax from the time it became due and payable, and that is all the penalty that is exacted in most of the States of this Union.

Mr. SARGENT. Is the time limited within which the tax shall be paid to get the benefit of this provision?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes; if they pay it within ninety days from the passage of this act the penalty is to be remitted.

Mr. SARGENT. And if not, the penalty revives?

Mr. SAULSBURY. No; the provision goes further. It shall not be lawful hereafter to demand and receive any more than the amount of the tax and the rate of interest here provided for. The penalty which was provided in the act of 1877 was most enormous. I venture to say that there is no other legislation in the whole land by which such a penalty is imposed upon delinquents in the payment of their taxes. It is oppressive and burdensome.

The adoption of this amendment, I have no question, will bring into the District treasury a large amount of taxes now in arrear, and I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment.

Mr. DORSEY. In regard to the first part of the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, if I understand it correctly, I believe that good will come from its adoption. I think, as he suggests, that a great deal of money will be paid in by people who are not now able to pay on account of the 2 per cent. a month penalty which attaches. But as to the latter part of the amendment, I think it will prevent any tax being collected in the future. As I understand it, it provides that hereafter the collector shall not collect a tax from anybody with a penalty greater than 6 per cent. per annum. It is well known to everybody that property-holders in this District cannot borrow money at 6 per cent.; and so they would prefer to borrow their own taxes and not pay them and let the 6 per cent. run on. If that is what the Senator intends to enact by the amendment, of course it is entirely untenable and I do not believe we should collect a dollar of tax in the District hereafter under such a provision.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The rate of 6 per cent. is really too high. One of the great difficulties of this country is the enormous rate of interest paid. I have understood that there are gentlemen in this city paying 10 per cent. interest. It would break any man to continue to pay such a rate. Any man would be a fool to lend to a business man who offered to pay him 10 per cent. on his money. He is as certain to break as the sun shines. But at the same time the rate of 10 per cent. obtains in most of the States of the Union; at least it is provided that a rate not higher than that may be agreed on. If the people of this District cannot borrow money at 6 per cent. in the District, they can get it if they will secure the money from persons outside of the District. There is plenty of money now in the cities that would be glad to be invested at 6 per cent. Are not the 4 per cent. bonds of the Government being taken rapidly, and so with the 4½ percents? Talk to me about people not being able to borrow money at 6 per cent. Any man can borrow money at 6 per cent. in this country who will secure the repayment of it, and if he cannot do that he ought not to borrow it and ought not to have it.

Mr. DORSEY. A great many people here have not found the persons who have money to lend on real estate at 6 per cent. If the Senator's amendment proposes to permit persons to withhold the payment of their taxes by paying 6 per cent., the result will be that there will not be a dollar of taxes paid into the District treasury the next ten years. I hope that part of the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. SARGENT. I think the Senator from Delaware had better withdraw the last part of his amendment. It is not necessary to his main amendment. The first part of his amendment is unquestionably right.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My object in the last part was to prevent the collector from going on hereafter and collecting these penalties of 2 per cent. a month.

Mr. SARGENT. The object of taxation, of course, is the support of the government, and it is absolutely necessary that it should be to a certain extent arbitrary. Of course, taxes are the last debts a man pays if he can avoid them, and therefore you must impose something in the nature of a penalty for a failure to pay promptly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Does the Senator know of any State of this Union that imposes such a penalty as that?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, many of them. In my own State, unless the law has been recently changed, after a sale for taxes the land cannot be redeemed without an addition of 50 per cent.

Mr. INGALLS. So it is in Kansas.

Mr. HARRIS. And in Tennessee.

Mr. SAULSBURY. You ought to remodel your laws.

Mr. SARGENT. Ex necessitate rei there must be heavy penalties levied in order to compel the payment of taxes. That arises from the very necessity of the case. These penalties have accumulated during years past, and ought to be lightened unquestionably, and lightened for the public interest, not particularly for the benefit of those persons who have made default, but because it is to the interest of the Government that the taxes shall be collected, and therefore an easier way should be made to collect them, and I very heartily approve of the first part of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will omit the latter part of the amendment.

Mr. DORSEY. Then I hope the amendment, as now modified, will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

All penalties imposed by the act approved March 3, 1877, chapter 117, upon delinquents for default in the payment of taxes levied under said act at the times specified therein, shall upon payment of the said taxes assessed against such delinquents within three months from the passage of this act, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. thereon, be remitted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to section 3 as amended.

The section was adopted.

The Secretary read section 4.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to strike out on line 16 the words "or a majority of them;" so as to read: "certified by said commissioners."

Mr. INGALLS. That requires the action of the board of commissioners to be unanimous in approving the vouchers. I can see no objection to it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. What would be the effect of that in case one member of the board should die?

Mr. EATON. Then only two would be left, and the two would be the whole board.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Suppose a commissioner should be sick for a week?

Mr. SARGENT. That would delay all business. I think the Senator in charge of the bill is rather too good-natured in giving way in this case. It seems to me a majority of the board ought to be sufficient. If a commissioner happened to be sick for five or six weeks, all the business of the District would have to stop unless his sick-room was invaded.

Mr. INGALLS. So much has been said of the method of expenditure in this District and the charges of corruption have been so extensively circulated, that I am inclined to apply upon expenditures in the future all possible safeguards. It is true that calamities might occur, that a commissioner might die, he might be ill, he might be absent; but much less difficulty would result from that than might arise from the permission of less than the entire number of commissioners acting in the approval of accounts and the signature of vouchers. I still am of the opinion that the words might well be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HARRIS. I will ask the Senator from South Carolina to modify his amendment so as to read:

Certified by said commissioners when all are able to act, or a majority of them in the event of the absence, or illness, or default of a commissioner.

Mr. BUTLER. I am perfectly willing to conform to the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee. My observation and experience in reference to such matters teach me that there ought to be some stringent law for the protection of the minority of boards of this kind. Minorities should have some power either to make a minority report or to dissent from the action of the majority in some way. Otherwise there may be some corrupt practices. Hence I moved the amendment. If my friend from Tennessee thinks his suggestion would improve the case, I shall make no objection to it.

Mr. HARRIS. The object I had in making the suggestion was simply this: if all three of the commissioners are required to sign every draft, it may work very serious inconvenience. As already stated by the Senator from California, a commissioner may be confined to his bed by illness for weeks; he may die; or he may be called from the city and be necessarily absent, in either of which events the whole business of the city would have to stop and no payment could be made for anything. Hence I think requiring all of them to concur when all are present is quite as much as ought to be required, allowing a majority of them to act where the two concur, one being necessarily absent.

Mr. DORSEY. I think if the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina is adopted it will amount to an embargo on the entire duties of this commission. If three active, capable men are appointed to these places, as it is hoped there will be, one may be absent, and one may differ from the other, a thousand things might happen which would prevent the discharge of their duties if unanimity were required. One man could prevent the whole machinery of the government here from moving on. It is the first time I ever heard of a requirement being made that a legislative body or an executive body composed of half a dozen men should be unanimous in order to do anything. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not appreciate the force of the remarks made by the Senator from Arkansas when he states that the mere fact of requiring these vouchers to be certified by the entire commission would block the wheels of government of the District. The provision requires "itemized vouchers, which shall have been audited and approved by the auditor of the District of Columbia, certified by said commissioners." I do not understand that the temporary absence or the temporary sickness of one of these commissioners would necessarily block the wheels of government when their duties in this regard are only to approve and certify vouchers. I think this particular business might stop for ten days or two weeks or a month without stopping the government.

Mr. INGALLS. Congress can be readily applied to in case of difficulty.

Mr. BUTLER. It does not stop the work at all; it simply, in my judgment, protects the citizens of the District of Columbia against imposition by requiring the entire commission to certify these itemized vouchers.

Mr. DORSEY. Under this section of the bill the commissioners of the District of Columbia have only one thing to do, and that is to certify vouchers in respect of items that Congress has previously appropriated money for. They cannot create any debt themselves; they cannot divert any money that is appropriated under the law from one object to another; they have no option whatever. Then after they pass upon the vouchers the First Comptroller of the Treasury has a veto, and they have got to show him that they have law for what they propose to pay. So in my judgment the commissioners of the District will be utterly unable to divert a single cent of the money appropriated for the maintenance of this government from the objects originally intended.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not intimate or suggest that they will do so, and I do not understand that the mere fact of certifying an itemized voucher is a power to divert any money. That is not the point at all. They might not divert any funds of the District government, but at the same time they might have power to approve and certify fraudulent vouchers for money. It is for the purpose of protecting the people against that, that I have made this suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to section 4.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill what is the force of these words in the eighth line of the section, "and the conditions of prompt payment?"

Mr. INGALLS. That relates to the same subject that has been partially reached by the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] at the close of the previous section providing what abatement or reduction shall be made if taxes are paid within a certain time after they have become due by law.

Mr. HOWE. Have we not already exhausted that subject by the provisions of the amendment?

Mr. INGALLS. The subject has very nearly exhausted me; I do not know whether I have exhausted the subject or not.

Mr. HOWE. Is it intended, in other words, to allow the commissioners to prescribe any new conditions of prompt payment?

Mr. INGALLS. No.

Mr. HOWE. Then what is the force of the words?

Mr. DORSEY. I do not know. There may be a great many words found in this bill that will not have much force. The Senator from Wisconsin by referring back to the bill will see it refers to an act approved June 30, 1874.

Mr. HOWE. I see the section makes reference to a previous statute, but this language seems to be intended to allow these commissioners to fix the times for payment and to offer certain inducements to prompt payment.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. It struck me that those inducements ought to be prescribed by statute, and I supposed that all of them had been prescribed by statute that you designed to offer.

Mr. DORSEY. No.

Mr. HOWE. Then why not strike out those words?

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection to their being stricken out.

Mr. DORSEY. Nor I.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin propose an amendment?

Mr. HOWE. I think the words may lead to some confusion, and therefore I move to strike out, in line 8, "and the conditions of prompt payment."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire whether there ought not to be, in the tenth line, some provision binding upon the collector as to the time within which after collecting any particular sum of money it should be paid into the Treasury.

Mr. DORSEY. That is provided for by existing law.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. I thought this was a new obligation to pay into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. DORSEY. No, that has been done since 1874.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to section 4, as amended.

The section was agreed to.

The Secretary read section 5.

Mr. KERNAN. I suggest, and to test the sense of the Senate I move to strike out the proviso in lines 13, 14, and 15. It will be observed that the section provides that the commissioners shall, for the work to be done, invite public proposals to do it, and subsequent in the section to that proviso it is directed that the commissioners shall require good securities by bond for doing the work. It seems to me that in a section framed as this is we should not have a proviso in the language I will read:

Provided, however, That the commissioners shall have the right in their discretion to reject any or all of such proposals.

In other words, you provide that they shall give notice and invite proposals to do the work according to the specifications which are made; you provide that the bidders shall give good security that if the contract is awarded to them as the lowest bidders they will do that work. Now, I do not think we should say that in the exercise of their discretion they may reject the lowest bid when the party is required to and offers to give satisfactory and adequate security that he will do the work as required. I therefore move to strike out that proviso in lines 13, 14, and 15.

I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill whether he desires to keep it in, having provided that the work shall be given to the lowest bidder and that he shall give good security to perform the work according to the specifications. Yet you say that the commissioners may reject the bid in their discretion. You might put it that they might reject all the bids; but I do not think it means that now. They may reject my proposal when I am the lowest bidder and offer the best security, and may accept yours which is higher. If you want to guard against that, as it has been done in my State where we have had some experience, we sometimes authorize the officers, if in their opinion it is for the interest of the State, to reject all the bids. I have no objection to that; but I object to their having a right to reject one and accept another when that other may not be the lowest.

Mr. HARRIS. If striking out the words "any or," leaving "all" in line 15 will be acceptable to the Senator, I do not suppose the committee will object to that modification.

Mr. KERNAN. Let it read:

Provided, however, That the commissioners shall have the right, in their discretion, to reject all such proposals.

Mr. HARRIS. Exactly. The committee will have no objection to striking out the words "any or."

Mr. INGALLS. The object of the committee was to so frame the bill that while it would require the commissioners to accept the lowest bid, if none of the bids were low enough in their judgment, they should have the right to reject all of them and invite new proposals.

Mr. KERNAN. Then I simply move that the words "any or," in line 15, be stricken out. That makes it satisfactory to me.

Mr. HARRIS. That will be satisfactory to the committee.

Mr. KERNAN. I move to strike out the words "any or."

Mr. DORSEY. This provision, if I remember rightly, is in every law authorizing officers to advertise for proposals for anything.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Arkansas will allow me to suggest to him that striking out the words "any or," in the fifteenth line, is satisfactory to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KERNAN. I withdraw my previous amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. It meets the exact view of the committee, I understand. It is wholly unobjectionable to us.

Mr. DORSEY. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York to strike out the words "any or," in line 15 of section 5.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 30, after the word "in," I move to insert "registered;" and after "United States" to insert "or of the District of Columbia;" so as to read:

Invested in registered bonds of the United States or of the District of Columbia.

Mr. DORSEY. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa why he desires to confine the investment to a class of United States securities. Why is it not better to allow the fund to be invested in any securities of the United States or of the District of Columbia? I see no objection, to adding "or of the District of Columbia."

Mr. ALLISON. My object is that these securities may be thoroughly safe. Now, there may be under the previous provisions here a considerable accumulation of this fund, and, if so, it seems to me this accumulation ought to be in registered bonds. I move to add "or of the District of Columbia," because it gives a larger latitude.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

Mr. DORSEY. It is adopted without objection.

Mr. ALLISON. After the word "in," in line 30, I propose to insert "registered;" and after the words "United States" to insert "or of the District of Columbia."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be agreed to. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. The committee have, through some oversight probably of their clerk—for surely if it had come under their consideration they could not have been guilty of such a great oversight, desiring to lay pavements here in the District at the lowest rate and of the most substantial character—through some inadvertence have left out the city of Baltimore as one of the places where advertisements ought to be inserted in the newspapers.

Mr. DORSEY. There is no objection to inserting Baltimore.

Mr. WHYTE. I was sure the moment the committee had their attention called to it they would insert it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to inserting "Baltimore" in line 8, as proposed by the Senator from Maryland? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SARGENT. Would it be in order to suggest "Cincinnati, Saint Louis, and San Francisco?" ["No!" "No!"] I am astonished that San Francisco is omitted. [Laughter.]

Mr. PADDOCK. I suggest that, in line 8, the words "one week" be stricken out and the words "thirty days" inserted. It seems to me one week is short notice.

Mr. DORSEY. Two weeks would be enough.

Mr. PADDOCK. Make it "twenty days."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator propose an amendment?

Mr. PADDOCK. I suggest that amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. Let me suggest to the Senator in view of his proposition that there should be the expense of advertising for thirty days, would it not be well that an advertisement of one week should give fifteen days' notice in order that after the advertisement of a week there should be fifteen days' notice to parties that they might put in their bids, and that there should be fifteen days after the bid was accepted before the party should be called upon to commence work. The effect of that will be that if an advertisement for one week is made in these three cities the party who sees it will have fifteen days after that time to examine the specifications and prepare his bid, and should his bid be accepted he will have fifteen more days within which to commence operations. This will give the city the benefit of competition from the various points, and give the proposed bidders time within which to get their materials and workmen here, should they come from some distance. I think, therefore, that the one week of advertising is sufficient, but there should be fifteen days' notice before the bids are to be closed.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should think the notice should be given once a week for thirty days, which would give sufficient publicity; but it seems to me that one week, on even the rule which my friend from Delaware proposes, would not give such publicity to bidders as ought to be given for important work, as this might be. However, I am not strenuous about it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let me suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that if he provides for publishing this notice for thirty days in the newspapers of these various cities, where their rates of advertising are very heavy, the expense of advertising itself will be a very serious matter. You cannot go to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, or any of these cities, and get a first-class paper to advertise for you without paying them very liberally for it. It would therefore be a very considerable item of expense to extend that advertisement for thirty days. One week, I think, would give sufficient notice to everybody.

Mr. BAYARD. Is any amendment pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska propose his suggestion as an amendment?

Mr. PADDOCK. Perhaps if it were changed so as to make it "reasonable notice" instead of notice for one week, that would cover the case quite as well as to extend the time definitely for thirty days. It seems to me that one week is too short notice. So far as the matter of expense in advertising is concerned, that is a mere bagatelle, as I conceive. Of course, if all the papers in the large cities are to be included in the list of those in which advertisements are to be put, it would be an expensive proceeding.

Mr. BAYARD. An advertisement daily for one week will be amply sufficient, I think, if at the expiration of that week fifteen days' notice should be given.

Mr. DORSEY, (to Mr. BAYARD.) Propose your amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. As the Senator from Nebraska has not proposed an amendment, I will. There is no pending amendment before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has not proposed any amendment.

Mr. PADDOCK. I barely made a suggestion.

Mr. BAYARD. I move in line 6, after the word "dollars," to insert the words "fifteen days;" so as to read:

> Any works the total cost of which shall exceed the sum of $5,000, fifteen days' notice shall be given.

And to make that amendment intelligible I would propose on line 8 to insert after the word "week" the word "daily;" so that the amendment as then made would read thus:

> The total cost of which shall exceed the sum of $5,000, fifteen days' notice shall be given in one newspaper in each of the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and Baltimore, for one week daily.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator should insert before the words "for one week" the words "by advertisement," in order to make it intelligible; otherwise it would read that fifteen days' notice should be given in one week. It should be "by advertisement one week."

Mr. BAYARD. I think that would puzzle the ingenuity of any one to do. There are some presumptions in favor of intelligence, even in the Senate. [Laughter.] It is very clear that you may give a man fifteen days' notice in a moment. In one day you may notify him that in fifteen days there will be proposals received. That I think is the reasonable and rational construction of these words. The Chair has heard the amendment that I have offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to insert after the word "dollars," in line 6, the words "fifteen days," and after the word "Baltimore" to insert "daily;" so as to read:

> That hereafter when any repairs of streets, avenues, alleys, or sewers within the District of Columbia are to be made, or when new pavements are to be substituted in place of those worn out, new ones laid, or new streets opened, sewers built or any works the total cost of which shall exceed the sum of $5,000, fifteen days' notice shall be given in one newspaper in each of the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and Baltimore for one week, daily, for proposals.

Mr. BAYARD. The words "by advertisement" should also be inserted in line 8 before "for one week."

Mr. INGALLS. That was my suggestion.

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir; I will include that also in my amendment so as to read "by advertisement for one week daily."

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that this is a very unreasonable arrangement altogether, so far as the great part of the work to be done is concerned. The idea that if five thousand dollars' worth of street grading, which involves hauling gravel for a short distance with carts and horses, is to be done in the city of Washington, it is necessary to have a fifteen days' advertisement in the four principal cities a week beforehand, strikes me as unreasonable.

Mr. BAYARD. I would say to the Senator that I have also another amendment that will give fifteen days' notice so that parties elsewhere in those cities may prepare and make their bids, and I propose to make a second amendment that the work shall not commence for fifteen days after bids shall have been accepted so as to allow parties competing for this work in other cities to come on in advance, examine the specifications, and after they have obtained the contract to have time to bring their force here to do the work.

Mr. HOAR. My point is that this particularity and expense of a provision for advertising, in regard to a great part of the work covered by this section, is exceedingly unreasonable. The idea is that there are to be placed in the government of the city of Washington and the city of Georgetown three commissioners appointed by the President, one of whom is to be an engineer officer of the United States, whom we are obliged to tie up so that they cannot make a contract for hauling gravel and doing the ordinary simple work of grading streets if it amounts to $5,000, without requiring an advertisement in four principal cities of the country and to be made fourteen days beforehand and set forth all the details and surveys of the job. I think the limit ought to be very much enlarged, and that it ought not to apply to such works as the mere building of streets at all. I move to substitute the word "ten" for "five" in the sixth line.

Mr. DORSEY. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes to strike out "five," in line 6, and insert "ten."

Mr. BAYARD. That is not an amendment to my amendment. It is a different amendment wholly.

Mr. DORSEY. I understood that the amendment of the Senator from Delaware was agreed to without objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware is considered as agreed to, there being no objection. The Chair will put the question again. The Chair hears no objection, and that amendment is agreed to. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. DORSEY. I think the limit provided in this section of $5,000 is high enough to place at the discretion of these commissioners or anybody else. I think when $5,000 is to be expended for public improvements some advertisement of that fact ought to be made, and I hope the Senator will not insist on his amendment to increase the limit to $10,000.

Mr. HOAR. There was a very distinguished citizen of Massachusetts, who had had large experience in public life, who was said to be about to write a book on parliamentary law, and he stated that if he did he should sum it all up in one sentence, and that was, "Never have a donkey in the chair." Now, the restraint on these commissioners in regard to these contracts is simply, never have a knave for a commissioner. If you have got commissioners who are capable of cutting up contracts into little five-thousand-dollar items and peddling them out and cheating the Government in that way, then nothing that you can put in the shape of a legislative obligation of constraint will be of the slightest value in restraining them. It seems to me, therefore, that, if the President is to be trusted with these appointments at all, the undertaking to bind the executive authorities of this District by a provision of this kind, that they shall not make a contract amounting to $5,000 for public work in Washington, is perfectly absurd. But I will not press the amendment against the wishes of the committee.

Mr. DORSEY. I think the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts applies to the whole section. If we are to strike out this item we might as well strike out the whole section and leave the entire business in the discretion of the commissioners, where it is now. I hope the Senator will not press the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts propose an amendment?

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to section 5.

Mr. BAYARD. I move on line 9 to strike out the words "with full specifications" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the general character of work," and on line 14 after the word "done" to insert "and stating that full specifications can be seen at the office of the commissioners." The object of that is to save the expense of publishing in a paper long specifications, but merely to give the general character of the work and state that the specifications can be seen at the office of the commissioners.

Mr. DORSEY. There is no objection to that, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware will be considered agreed to, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOWE. I do not understand that the words "with full specifications" refer to the advertisement, but only to the proposals made by bidders. I suppose the bidders propose.

Mr. BAYARD. The bidders propose, but they do not publish their proposals. The proposal of the bidder is not advertised. It is the contract that the District proposes that he should take, and the specifications proposed to be advertised are of the contract. If they are to be in great detail, it would be very expensive to publish them.

Mr. HOWE. Unquestionably; but this is a notice for proposals, not of proposals.

Mr. BAYARD. But the proposals to be received are not published.

Mr. HOWE. No; and therefore I thought they should be accompanied with full specifications. But those who drew the bill can tell what they meant by it. It really seemed to me from reading it that the full specifications are to accompany the proposals of the bidders, and not the advertisement by the commissioners.

Mr. BAYARD. That was not the construction I gave to it.

Mr. DORSEY. Whatever the purpose of the authors of the bill may have been, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware is an improvement upon it in any way, and I hope, therefore, it will be accepted.

Mr. HOWE. It seems to me, with all deference, that it is not an improvement if these specifications are to accompany the offers of the bidders and not to accompany the advertisement of the commissioners. Certainly you ought to require of the bidders full and accurate specifications of what they propose to do.

Mr. DORSEY. The Senator from Wisconsin stated the fact when he said that the intention of this bill originally was to invite proposals with full specifications. The specifications come from the man proposing to do the work. But the Senate now have changed the bill so as not to give the commissioners any option whatever, and therefore this proposition ought to be changed. When the commissioners had an option to accept or reject any proposal made, it was proper that proposals should come from the bidders. Now they have no option except to take the lowest bidder.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to inform my friend from Arkansas that he labors under a mistake. The bill, as amended, gives to the commissioners authority to reject all propositions that may be made; and striking out the words "any or" does not change the original sense of the section at all.

Mr. DORSEY. I understand that; but before the commissioners had a right to reject "any or all," which is quite a different matter. They could have rejected the lowest bid, or the top one, or the middle one, or any other one they did not think was a proper bid to accept, or the best pavement to accept, or the best work to accept.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Arkansas who furnishes and presents the specifications, the party desiring the work to be done or the party proposing to do it?

Mr. DORSEY. Under the original bill the party proposing to do the work was to submit to the commissioners his specifications of the sort of work, the sort of pavement he wanted to lay down.

Mr. MATTHEWS. In the experience I have had the party wanting work done always furnishes specifications of what he wants done.

Mr. DORSEY. That is true when the party wanting work done knows what he wants done; but in this case no one knows what sort of a pavement or what sort of a work the best interests of the Government require. The original purpose of this section was to have these specifications of material, &c., submitted to the commissioners and let them pass judgment upon the different kinds submitted to them. But that purpose is changed by the amendment already adopted in the Senate, and I hope the amendment of the Senator from Delaware will now prevail.

Mr. HOWE. It does seem to me that if it was the purpose of the framers of this bill to call on contractors to propose to build any kind of street or any kind of pavement as they saw fit at such a price as they saw proper to exact, then there can be no such thing as competitive bids. One man proposes to build one kind of pavement at one price, another to do an entirely different thing at an entirely different price; and there is no competitive bidding. Therefore I can see no possible use in this advertising, in this calling for proposals at all. It seems to me you should leave the whole matter to the discretion of the commissioners. But if, as suggested by the Senator from Ohio, it is thought safe to instruct the commissioners by your bill to ascertain just what work they want done, what kind of pavement they want laid, and then the commissioners could call for competitive bids, then full specifications of the kind of work to be done should be furnished by the commissioners, not necessarily advertise, but should be ready to be exhibited to bidders.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Delaware is agreed to, no objection being made. The question now is on agreeing to section 5 as amended.

Mr. ALLISON. Before that vote is taken I desire to ask the Senator in charge of this bill one or two questions in reference to the paving. I notice that in line 44 it is provided that the Government of the United States is required to pay one-half of the cost of this paving, and it is to be deducted from the percentage paid by the Government and counted as a part of it. I have not examined the bill with sufficient care to ascertain how the other half is to be paid.

Mr. DORSEY. The other half is to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALLISON. Out of the other half of the revenue raised by taxation?

Mr. DORSEY. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask further if there is any limitation upon the power of the commissioners to adopt new improvements in the way of pavements. What is the restriction, if any, upon the commissioners of the District in reference to new pavements?

Mr. DORSEY. This bill requires that every improvement proposed to be made by the commissioners shall first be submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury in items and in detail. The Secretary of the Treasury is to pass upon the propriety of expending money for such improvements, and is to transmit the items to Congress. Congress is then to pass upon them, and if they are all right to appropriate the money, and then the commissioners can go on and do the work, and not till then. They have no option to spend a dollar originally on such improvements. Under the existing law, which this bill reenacts, it is a misdemeanor for the commissioners of the District to create a single dollar of debt, directly or indirectly.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Before the vote is taken on this section I move to still further amend it by striking out the word "three" in line 19 and inserting "two;" so as to read:

The total cost of which shall not exceed $2 per square yard.

Mr. DORSEY. I should be glad to accept almost any amendment, and so would my colleagues on the committee, but I am afraid that that amendment ought not to be accepted. I do not believe that a suitable pavement can be laid here at $2 a yard, and I believe that that question ought to be left in a large degree with the commissioners or to the persons having control of the District. The only good pavement that I know of that we have here is on Pennsylvania avenue, and that cost $4 a yard.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am satisfied that $2 a yard will cover the absolute cost of any good pavement that may be put down in the city, and I believe in keeping the maximum amount down. Those who expend money will almost always reach any maximum amount that you allow for the government of a board. I believe that $2 a square yard is ample. I believe that the streets in the city of Washington can be paved for that amount. I know it can be done at my home, and I believe it can be done here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. EATON. I do not think really we ought to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island without a little more information from the committee. My information is that the best kind of pavement, such pavement as ought to be laid down here, cannot be placed for $2 a yard. Suppose it could be done for $2.10, $2.15, or $2.20, this amendment would prevent the use of that pavement. We must leave something to men, we must trust something to the integrity of the commissioners that the Senate confirms.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill or the chairman of the committee if a pavement cannot be laid for $2.

Mr. DORSEY. I presume a pavement can be laid for that.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I mean a good pavement.

Mr. DORSEY. No, sir; I do not think there is a good pavement such as ought to be laid on streets that have much traffic can be laid for less than $2.50 or $3 a yard—a pavement that is worth laying down at all. We have had an experience in this city of laying down poor pavements. There are now about eighteen hundred thousand yards—and I should be glad to have Senators remember that enormous quantity—eighteen hundred thousand square yards of pavement that are absolutely gone, and it would be a great benefit to the property-holders of the city if they were taken up and the streets allowed to revert back to their old condition as mud roads. There are eighteen hundred thousand square yards of pavement in this city that ought to be renewed to-morrow that were put down three or four years ago at a cost of $3.50 or $4 a yard. I do not want any more of that sort of pavements. I think a first-class pavement that would last fifteen or twenty years can be laid down at $2.50 or $3 a yard. I think the lowest limit imposed by law ought to be $3.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the Senator from Rhode Island to what pavement he refers when he says it can be put down at $2 a square yard?

Mr. BURNSIDE. Good asphalt pavement. I know it by experience. I have paid for pavements in the city of Providence, and I am as well satisfied as I can be of anything, that a good pavement can be laid here in the city for $2 a yard.

Mr. INGALLS. What kind of pavement?

Mr. BURNSIDE. A concrete or asphalt pavement. I know it can be done.

Mr. PADDOCK. As good as that on Pennsylvania avenue?

Mr. BURNSIDE. Precisely that.

Mr. BAYARD. I have very reliable authority for the statement that a pavement has been laid now and can be inspected in this town for $1.75 per square yard, which is founded upon a very firm base of granite, and will need for its amendment or renewal at any time a mere surface application. That pavement is guaranteed for ten years' time. There is no question that $2 per square yard, at the present prices of labor and materials, is enough to pay for a substantial and safe pavement; and private parties will be apt to get it done for a great deal less

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it.

Mr. INGALLS. I hope the amendment will not be declared to be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator call for a division?

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir. I rose before the announcement had been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that the Chair announced that the proposition had been carried before the Senator rose.

Mr. INGALLS. Have I a right to call for a division?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will entertain the call.

Mr. INGALLS. Then can I address the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. BURNSIDE. If the Senator is not satisfied, I will move a reconsideration of the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair entertains the call for a division.

Mr. INGALLS. I was about to say that I hoped the amendment would not be declared to be adopted, because I believe that the maximum here is too low rather than too high. There has been a vast amount of pavement laid in this town of every description that is known, including asphalt, cobble-stone, wood, and Macadam; and if there is a yard of pavement here worthy of the name, durable, easy of transit, and satisfactory in every particular, so far as relates to the resistance to frost and weather, for less than $3, I have yet to know where it is. The pavement upon Pennsylvania avenue is one, I believe, that will stand every test that can be applied to it. There is a piece of pavement also upon I street near Fifteenth, lying along the south side of Franklin square, that has endured for a number of years very severe tests. Another piece is near the Arlington Hotel upon Vermont avenue. But the other asphalt pavements that have been laid I believe will be found to have been very unprofitable, very unsatisfactory, very transient in their enduring power; but they look well for a short time, and have an apparently good surface; yet they soon crack and crumble and require continuous applications to keep them in order. Part of the materials of which they consist readily evaporate, destroying the cohesion of the surface material so that it becomes friable and crumbles and is blown away or washed into the sewers.

I think the maximum proposed in this section is too small. I very much doubt the statement of the Senator from Rhode Island, as applied to this town, that a satisfactory pavement can be laid for $2 a yard, of the character that he has described. There have been, as the Senator from Arkansas remarks, a vast number laid that are worse than useless. The money was thrown away that was expended in their laying down. There are miles here that men in vehicles will avoid rather than traverse them, and where the property would be benefited by having them removed and the dirt road restored as it was years ago. I trust the Senate will not adopt the amendment, because, while the bill will undoubtedly go into conference, this is the last time we shall have the opportunity of intelligible discussion, and I should regret very much indeed to secure by any indirection an agreement to an amendment in a committee of conference where the reason was not fully stated here. I think if the Senate consider the matter well, they will not agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that the amendment will not prevail. We have recently had an experiment. Pennsylvania avenue was paved under the direction of a commission appointed by Congress. There is a pavement that is satisfactory, I believe, to the country. But that cost more than $3 a yard. It is very true that you can get a concrete pavement laid as low as a dollar a square yard. You can get pavements at almost any price. It depends, of course, on the value of the material put into it what price it will cost. I hope there will be no restriction to prevent the authorities, whenever they do replace the existing bad pavements, from obtaining better ones.

Mr. DORSEY. I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this bill does not fix the amount to be paid, but it provides a limit, a maximum sum that may not be exceeded in any case. I presume it is well known that there are many streets in this city where the pavement has worn out, where Belgian blocks ought to take the place of the old pavement. That will have to be done where there is a heavy traffic and large business. I believe in no case can that be done for less than $3.50 a yard. While I appreciate what the Senator from Delaware says in regard to the particular pavement he alludes to, I do not believe that pavements could be laid in this town for any less money than it can be in other cities of this country, and I venture the assertion that no pavement can be laid down that is worth laying for $2 a square yard.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I can only say in answer to the Senator from Arkansas that I know the reverse. I know that a pavement can be laid for less than that which is worth laying, and is a very good pavement. I only want to put myself on the record as knowing that.

Mr. DORSEY. I expressed my opinion; that is all. The Senator is entitled to have his opinion.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am talking from absolute knowledge.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division is called for on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 19, noes 23.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. I am sure the Senate will not vote to cut this down to $2 when it is notorious that the best pavement we have here cost more than $3, and when it is obvious that much of the pavement will have to be replaced with stone pavement that could not be put down so low even as $3. I therefore hope, while this does not make it obligatory that every yard of pavement shall cost the sum named, there will not be a restriction put upon it so as to force the meanest kind of pavement that can be obtained upon the city.

Mr. BAYARD. I by no means suppose that a pavement cannot be laid at a greater expense than $2 a yard; but I am very sure that in Washington an excellent pavement can be laid for that sum. It has been laid in this city; it is here now for inspection; and by authority which is controlling to me, in which I have entire reliance, I am informed that a pavement is down for perhaps two blocks—the streets I have forgotten, but Twelfth street is one of the streets; and it is in a street in which large and heavy ice-wagons stand constantly, giving it more than usual stress. It has been down for ten months, and stands satisfactorily to this time. It is guaranteed as I understand for ten years, and needs only surface dressing as a repair; and that pavement cost $1.70 or $1.74 per square yard.

The most expensive piece of pavement as to its first cost in this city was in front of the Arlington Hotel, and I believe it cost at the time $5 per square yard. It was made before any large extent of these expensive pavements had been put down, and was laid as an experiment, as a sample, in the most expensive manner. I witnessed myself its construction, day after day, as it progressed, with considerable interest. That was in a time of most inflated prices. It was at a time when pavements of that character were very little understood. The times have changed completely, and we have now a rate of cost not more than one-half as to labor and materials, and an experience in laying it which tends still more to diminish the cost.

Now, I do not know that in this city we should be ready to pay the topmost prices for the most expensive pavement. There is reason in all things; and if a pavement at $2 a square yard should answer practically all purposes, certainly not more than that should be paid. I do not believe in a false economy or in the shortsightedness of mere limited expense when that expense may not be adequate for the object in view; but I think the people of this community, who are to pay the half of this tax, and the people of the United States, who are to bear the other half, have had a bitter lesson in the extravagance of pavements in this city. It was not because they were put down at a nominal rate that was high; it was because they were put down unfaithfully, they were put down by men who did not understand their business, and they were put down because they were wretched jobs given to a set of corrupt contractors. That was why they all went up.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask my friend from Delaware how he accounts for the job on Pennsylvania avenue recently put down, and put down by a commission established by Congress at the lowest prices that could be obtained—how he accounts for it that that pavement cost so much more than these which he speaks of?

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator refers to the pavement on Pennsylvania avenue?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not know how to answer that except that there seemed to be a very great error on the part of somebody as to one-half of that pavement. It is to-day one of the most cruel and unmerciful pavements in the world, for if a little rain falls upon it no horse can keep his feet. That is the daily experience of every Senator who passes up that street, and sees perhaps half a dozen poor animals struggling on the ground. I remember very well it was the subject of continued repair for one year after it was supposed to be finished. That pavement being laid down under the supervision of an officer of the American Army is to me a guarantee that it was honestly done; but while I believe it was honestly done I must also say that I expect it was expensively done. The officers of our Army have clean hands, but they have very open ones through which expenditure flows. They are I think the most extravagant men to build. Although they may build safely and they build honestly, they build extravagantly. That, I think, is a commentary which will be sustained by the experience of every man.

This is a practical question; and if it shall be discovered that $2 per square yard will not build a proper pavement it can be the subject of amendment; but I think it is flying in the face of actual experience to say that it cannot be done and that we ought therefore to fix a higher rate. The truth is that there is a splendid sense of expenditure in this District, quite alarming to a person like myself from the rural districts.

Mr. DORSEY. I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware what he would do on Seventh street, for example, the upper part of which is now entirely without a pavement and ought to be paved with Belgian blocks. How would this limit of $2 a square yard apply to that?

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator know the cost of laying a Belgian pavement per square yard?

Mr. DORSEY. I understand about $3 or three dollars and a half a square yard.

Mr. BAYARD. The Belgian pavement is the best pavement for endurance that has yet been discovered, and the Belgian pavement can be laid for $2 a square yard or less.

Mr. EATON. Where has it ever been laid at that price?

Mr. BAYARD. I am unable to say.

Mr. EATON. Nowhere except in Belgium, I reckon. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAYARD. There is abundance of stone in this country and these blocks can be furnished very cheaply. Of course I am not prepared to make a statement without knowledge.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I am not acquainted with the value of pavements; but as the Senator from Vermont said that nothing was more notorious (I may not use his exact language) than the fact that we had nothing done in this District in the way of pavements for less than $3 a yard, I desire to say that nothing is more notorious than the fact that one-half the money that we have appropriated for improvements in this District never has gone into the form of improvements at all, but has been paid in every sort of corrupt way to men who never did the work, or else all reports are false. I remember when I was in the other House that we thought we were giving a very liberal appropriation to aid this District. The result turned out to be that it was squandered in every sort of way. Contracts were made at the highest possible prices, sublet and resublet, until a few favorites got the great bulk of the money. I have turned to the statutes in the last few minutes and I find that on the 3d of March, 1873, we gave them $1,241,920 to enable the board of public works to go on with the paving in the District. A few months afterward we gave them to complete the improvement of the streets $913,497; and then to reimburse them for the improvement of the avenues $1,000,000 more; making $3,155,417 which was given in a very short time.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator know the entire amount that has been appropriated by Congress for the improvement of the streets and avenues of this city?

Mr. BECK. No, I do not; but I find in the statutes these three acts, one of the 8th of January and another of the 3d of March, 1873, and all within sixty days of each other.

Mr. INGALLS. The entire amount that has been appropriated by Congress for the improvement of the streets and avenues of this city from the foundation of the Government has been less than $6,000,000, whereas the people have paid about $35,000,000.

Mr. BECK. But here are $3,155,000 given within forty days, and the pavements that we have are of a character not to commend themselves to the Congress of the United States, nor is the history of the contracts such as to commend them to anybody. It seems to me if we are going to commence a system of economy we should confine them in their contracts. If they are allowed $3 a yard no contracts will be made under that sum, whereas if we say it shall not exceed $2 or $2.50, exactly the same contract will be made, the same sort of work will be done, and plenty of men will be found to do it. If they do not go up to the full sum allowed, the new commissioners who are expected to be appointed will be very different from any we have had heretofore. I can see no harm to be done in trying to keep them down to something that is reasonable, and what the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Rhode Island both say the work can certainly be done for. If you allow them to go to $5 a yard they will expend it all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MATTHEWS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE,] who has been suddenly required to leave the Senate Chamber. If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 16, nays 26; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask the Senate to give me unanimous consent to make a motion, against which I hope nobody will vote. It is that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next. ["Oh, no!"]

Mr. INGALLS. I shall have no objection to that if the Senate will agree to finish this bill to-night; but if any Senator proposes to adjourn without finishing it, I shall ask the Senate to sit to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to section 5 as amended.

Mr. WHYTE. I hope the Senate will allow the vote to be put on my motion.

Mr. ALLISON. Before section 5 is voted upon——

Mr. SARGENT. What is the pending motion?

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to move an amendment to section 5.

Mr. ANTHONY. The motion of the Senator from Maryland is in order.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask that my motion be put.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next at twelve o'clock meridian.

Mr. DORSEY. I hope that motion will not be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Maryland, which is not debatable.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the consent of the Senator from Maryland to make a single remark with reference to his motion.

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly.

Mr. WINDOM. The Committee on Appropriations is prepared at any moment to take up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which, it will be observed by the Senate, is very lengthy, and will require doubtless a great deal of time in conference. I think we ought not to adjourn over, but to proceed with the consideration of that bill at the earliest moment possible.

Mr. FERRY. In that connection I want to remind the Senate that I intend to call up the bill that was reported by the Committee on Finance a few days ago, as soon as the Senate concludes the pending bill.

Mr. WHYTE. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to obtain the attention of the Senate and to press the consideration of the bill I have named as soon as a final vote is reached upon the District bill.

Mr. HEREFORD. I want to say that I hope the Senate will not adjourn over until Monday; but that it will sit to-morrow in order to complete the consideration of the District bill and to take up the bill to repeal the resumption act, so that if we are to do anything for the relief of the people we may do it at once.

Mr. WHYTE. I have withdrawn the motion which I made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to adjourn over is withdrawn. The question recurs on the amendment sent to the desk by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of the fifth section the following proviso:

Provided, however, That work capable of being executed under a single contract shall not be subdivided so as to reduce the sum of money to be paid therefor to less than $1,000; and all contracts shall be copied in a book kept for that purpose, and be signed by at least two of the said commissioners; and no contract involving an expenditure of more than $100 shall be valid until recorded and signed as aforesaid.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, which has just been reported.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out, beginning at line 44 of section 5, the words "the United States" and all that follows down to and including the word "work," in line 54, as follows:

The United States shall pay one-half of the cost of all work done under the provisions of this section, except that done by the railway companies, which payment shall be credited as part of the 50 per cent. which the United States contributes toward the expenses of the District of Columbia for that year; and all payments shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury on the warrant or order of the commissioners of the District of Columbia or a majority thereof, in such amounts and at such times as they may deem safe and proper in view of the progress of the work.

I move this amendment under the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas that every provision with reference to the portion the United States shall pay is made in a previous section of the bill. I think unless this clause is stricken out it may create some confusion with reference to what can or ought to be done in the paving of the streets.

Mr. DORSEY. I do not think the words ought to be stricken out which the Senator from Iowa has read. I do not see what becomes of the section if those words are not left in.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Arkansas stated a while ago that under a previous section of the bill the expenses of the District were to be paid one-half by the Government of the United States and the other half by general taxation in the District of Columbia. This section provides for the improvement of streets, &c. Therefore, without that provision, the expenses of such improvement will naturally be paid out of the general fund. One-half of it will be paid by the Government and the other half by the city.

Mr. DORSEY. The Senator makes this error: the section does not provide for the improvement of the streets. It provides for the means of controlling any improvements which may be made hereafter. It seems to me that it is essental that in this section a clear statement should be made of who and what are to pay the costs of any improvement of the streets. The section goes on to apply to street railways: that they shall pay a certain proportion; that whatever remains after the street railways have paid shall be divided equally between the property-holders of the District and the United States Government. To strike out the provision the Senator from Iowa moves to strike out will leave the whole section senseless.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

The amendment was rejected

Mr. ALLISON. Now I offer the following amendment, to insert at the end of the section:

> But no work shall be done under this section requiring appropriation of funds to be provided under this act, until the cost of the projected improvement shall be submitted to and approved by Congress.

Mr. INGALLS. That is merely repetition of what is very clearly stated in a previous section of the bill. While of course it would not be injurious or specially objectionable, it is merely repetition, and therefore superfluous and unnecessary. I am amazed at the Senator from Iowa who moves the amendment, and I trust, upon having his attention called to the fact I state, he will withdraw it.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall be glad to have the Senator from Kansas show me wherein the commissioners of the District of Columbia are prohibited from making improvements until an appropriation is made by Congress. If he will show me that in any section of the bill, of course I shall yield to his suggestion.

Mr. INGALLS. On page 5, commencing in line 49, the third section provides that:

> The said commissioners shall submit to the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and annually thereafter, for his examination and approval, a statement showing in detail the work proposed to be undertaken by them during the fiscal year next ensuing, and the estimated cost thereof.

That is followed by the further declaration that—

> The Secretary of the Treasury shall carefully consider all estimates submitted to him as above provided, and shall approve, disapprove, or suggest such changes in the same, or any item thereof, as he may think the public interest demands.

The Secretary of the Treasury is to submit these estimates so revised to Congress and there they are to be again revised, and to the extent that they are approved by Congress 50 per cent. shall be appropriated to carry on the work. There will be no money in the Treasury from which anything can be paid and nothing upon which any contract can be made until all these conditions have been complied with. Therefore the amendment submitted by the Senator from Iowa is simply a repetition of what already exists in the bill.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. But suppose the commissioners should go on and do what is not estimated for, what then?

Mr. INGALLS. They are subject to punishment, by indictment, under existing law.

Mr. ALLISON. The trouble with me is that I find all the power of the present commissioners of the District of Columbia transferred to these new commissioners. The present commissioners of the District of Columbia have complete power over the streets, alleys, and avenues of this city. Therefore prior to 1880, and before this specific appropriation or estimate made by the commissioners and the Secretary of the Treasury, they can if they choose provide for the improvement of streets in this District.

The amendment which I proposed first, namely, to strike out a certain portion of the fifth section, was disagreed to, because it was said it was provided for before. Under the fifth section whenever these commissioners undertake a work of improvement, the Secretary of the Treasury is bound to issue his warrant and pay 50 per cent. of the cost of such improvements. If it be true that from this time forward no expenditure can be made until estimated for and until it receives the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and the appropriations are made by Congress of one-half the amount, then my amendment is unnecessary; but unless that is clearly stated, these commissioners under the powers given to them by this bill may go on as the commissioners now are going on with the streets and avenues in this city and provide for improvements, and the Secretary of the Treasury would be bound under the fifth section to pay to the contractors 50 per cent. from time to time of the cost of such improvements. Of course, that 50 per cent. is taken for the cost of the improvements, from time to time. It may all or nearly all be exhausted by these commissioners so that the ordinary expenditures of the District government cannot be paid out of taxation but out of this appropriation. That is my object in offering the amendment.

Mr. DORSEY. Will the Senator allow me one moment?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DORSEY. I should think by reading the bill the Senator from Iowa would agree with the committee that under the bill Congress appropriates specifically for a specific purpose. If Congress appropriates $200,000 to maintain public schools, the commissioners cannot divert that to something else; and if it appropriates $200,000 to improve the streets, that money can only be used for improving the streets.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; then there can be no objection to my amendment, because if no money is appropriated to improve streets, the Secretary will not pay the 50 per cent.

Mr. DORSEY. The Senator seems to have forgotten the fact that this bill does not go into effect until 1880.

Mr. ALLISON. Then, between now and 1880 these commissioners, under powers formerly devolved on them, can go on to any extent they choose and improve these streets, and under this section we should be compelled to pay out of the Treasury 50 per cent. of the cost of such improvements.

Mr. DORSEY. The Senator is entirely in error. Neither this section nor any other section of the bill is to take effect until 1880; and how can the commissioners go on under a law which does not exist? The Senator knows, because his committee, I believe, prepared the act, that under the existing law it is a penal offense for the commissioners of the District of Columbia to create one single dollar of debt not authorized by Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course I do not wish to embarrass the bill in any way. In the fifth section, beginning in line 44, I find this provision:

> The United States shall pay one-half of the cost of all work done under the provisions of this section, except that done by the railway companies, which payment shall be credited as part of the 50 per cent. which the United States contributes toward the expenses of the District of Columbia for that year.

Mr. DORSEY. Can that section take effect until the act goes into effect? The bill is not to take effect until 1880.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know that it can. I said to the Senator from Kansas that I had not read this bill as carefully as the gentlemen who prepared it; but I want to prevent the commissioners of the District of Columbia from making such improvements of the streets as they choose, making the Government of the United States pay one-half the cost.

Mr. DORSEY. I need not repeat the fact that under existing law the commissioners of the District of Columbia cannot improve a single foot of a street without specific authority to do so from Congress; and they cannot do it under this bill until after the Secretary of the Treasury and after Congress have passed upon the matter, and then it will have to go to the Committee on Appropriations and Congress must make the appropriation for the specific work to be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now before the Senate is upon agreeing to section 5 as amended.

Mr. ROLLINS. I move to add, at the end of the sixty-seventh line of section 5, on page 12, a few words, which I think the Committee on the District of Columbia will agree to. I move to add the following words:

> Together with the franchise of said company.

So as to read:

> Which certificates shall bear interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum until paid, and which, until they are paid, shall remain and be a lien upon the property on or against which they are issued, together with the franchise of said company.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. DORSEY. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. To make the section to conform to the amendment adopted at my suggestion, the word "five" should be stricken out in line 6 and "one" inserted, so as to read:

> That hereafter when any repairs of streets, avenues, alleys, or sewers within the District of Columbia are to be made or when new pavements are to be substituted in place of those worn out, new ones laid, or new streets opened, sewers built, or any works the total cost of which shall exceed the sum of $1,000, fifteen days' notice shall be given in one newspaper in each of the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and Baltimore, by advertisement for one week, &c.

It is very obvious that as the section now stands there need be no competition, no competitory proposals, for contracts of $5,000. An amendment has already been adopted looking to the prevention of a subdivision of contracts so as to bring them within that sum. My amendment requires that no subdivision of contracts shall be made so as to reduce the amount contracted for to less than $1,000. To make the section consistent I have moved, therefore, that the word "one" be substituted for "five" on the line and at the place that I have suggested.
